UNITED STATES SATURDAY POST

SAMUEL D. PATTERSON & CO. PUBLISHERS.

NUMBER NINETY-EIGHT, CHESNUT STREET.

TWO DOLLARS A-YEAR IN ADVANCE.

THREE DOLLARS IF NOT PAID IN ADVANCE.

A FAMILY NEWSPAPER: NEUTRAL IN POLITICS: DEVOTED TO GENERAL NEWS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, MORALITY, AGRICULTURE AND AMUSEMENT.

VOLUME XXIV. PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, APRIL 13, 1844. WHOLE NO. 1185.

Original Poetry.

LINES TO ——.

On a Group of Flowers which She gave me

WRITTEN FOR THE UNITED STATES SATURDAY POST.

BY EDWARD J. PORTER

I watched the lovely leaflets fade,
I sighed above their lone decay;
And yet my sighs could not have stayed
The vanishing of one sweet ray.
They withered when removed from thee,
And though with tenderest care I tried
To keep each line unfadingly,
The pining leaflets, drooping, died.

Thus have I seen a form, whose spray
Danced laughingly at morning's hour,
Thy trembling back beneath the ray,
Of mortide's brighter, wilder power
Or late beneath some ruder touch
Than that which waked its notes at first,
Refuse the tones we prized so much,
And pining in its sadness, burst.

Thy gentle hand had trained the leaves,
They withered when from thee removed;
And as the shrinking fountain grieves,
Where beams too powerful have poured,
Their gentle gleams departed too,
Like song wreaths from the lute strings flown,
When he, whose touch might well renew
Their sweet but scattered tones was gone

Original Tales.

RUTH;

Or, The Days of William Penn.

CONCLUDED.

WRITTEN FOR THE UNITED STATES SATURDAY POST

PART II.

All was still and calm, when Ruth sought the spot pointed out by Eric, but he was not there. She waited nearly an hour in painful feeling, yet he came not. "My brother's coldness has aroused his pride," she thought, "and I shall see him no more," and the drop that moistened her cheek was not the dew of the night. Several days passed, and on the evening of each, she sought the same spot, but still Eric came not, and sad and dispirited she returned.

In the meantime, Ephraim had commenced the instruction of Menone, and the bright eyes of the Indian maiden sparkled with intelligence as she listened. She lingered later in the evening, ere she sought her father's wigwam, and the flowers of the morning scarcely bent under her light footstep, in its early returning pressure. But one day, after the sun had risen, she came slowly, and with dejected looks, and when Ephraim left the cave, she sat down at the feet of Ruth, gazing with a sad and earnest expression in her face.

"Why dost thou gaze on me thus, Menone? speak! what hast thou heard?" and Ruth paused, blushing and trembling.

The Indian girl was silent for a few minutes, then, as if unwillingly, her words struggled slowly from her lips.

"Menone, sad—Secane too, sad—arrow hurt white man—Secane know not—Weccacoe Indian tell—bring book—" and she drew from her bosom a sealed letter, directed to Ruth, who broke it open with a trembling hand. The writing was strange to her, but requested her immediate presence at the dying pillow of—whom?—her night became dim, and she would have fallen but for the supporting arms of Menone.

Returning consciousness brought the most distressing feelings. Ephraim would be absent until night, having gone on an excursion with his child. Ought she to go without his consent? The settlement of the Swedes at Weccacoe was less than two miles distant, and the Indian carrier of the letter was waiting, with his canoe, on the shore of the Delaware. In vain Ruth tried to calm her feelings, by calling to aid those principles of endurance and resignation which her faith dictated. She saw but her dying lover, and wringing the hand of Menone, who hastily collected a change of garments for her, she hurried into the canoe, and unheeding the presence of the strange Indian, gave way to her sad feelings in tears. The swift motion of the boat soon left Coquenoe, now Philadelphia, in the distance, and when Ruth looked up, they were approaching another settlement. A small church crowned the height above the river, and near it stood several houses substantially built. To one of these, after leaving the canoe, the Indian led the way, followed by the trembling Ruth. In an apartment that overlooked a garden, the guide stopped, and the agitated girl turned around. A couch stood in one corner, over which a venerable looking man was leaning. He beckoned her to approach. Can the pale, unconscious form stretched on that couch be Eric Wohlden, so lately healthful, and glowing in youthful pride and devoted love? Ruth sank into a chair by his side.

"I rejoice you have come, dear lady," said the stranger, "his last wish was to see you, and to leave you his few earthly possessions."

"You cannot mean, that he is dead," exclaimed Ruth, starting up with a cry of anguish, "oh! Eric, Eric, do we part thus?"

"Not yet, lady," said the stranger, "but I have little hope. This heavy sleep has lasted for several hours, and on his awaking hangs life or death."

With what tenacity does the human heart cling to hope. Ruth watched that night by the pillow of her lover. Towards morning he moved, with a faint groan, when the stranger urged her to retire to a corner of the apartment, fearing the sight of her might overcome him in his weak state. Her name trembled on his lips, but again he sank into unconsciousness.

"You have need of rest, lady," said the old man, "there is a couch in the next room, and the Indian will relieve your watch. Come hither, Secane."

"Oh! no, not Secane," cried Ruth, shuddering, as the young chief entered the room. "How came he here?"

"Nay, fear not," resumed the stranger, "a kinder nurse there is not. He watched with me several hours before you came, for he left Coquenoe, the moment he heard of our young friend's danger. He is much distressed, for he knew not, until then, that his arrows had injured him, as Eric had kept the circumstances secret, and only his extreme danger induced me to send for you, lady. Secane learned the rest from the chief, who brought you hither, and urged by his own regret, and the distress of an Indian maid he loves, who had discovered that Eric was your friend, he came to atone for his fault. They are a kindly race, though strange. Plants of the western wilderness, but placed here by the same Divine hand, that has cultured those of the east, until they have borne the rich fruits of civilization and Christianity. What may we not hope for these?" At this moment, the slumber of Eric broke, and in a feeble tone, he again breathed the name of Ruth. Her presence was imparted to him with great caution, and she approached with trembling steps. He turned his dim eyes on her, with an expression of mingled affection and sadness, and after some moments silence, spoke in a low voice, with extreme difficulty.

"This is kind, my own Ruth—and I would—I might live—to repay it—by devotion—but—it may not be. I have scarcely breath—to speak—oh! listen to me." She raised his head gently on her arm, and while her tears fell on his cheek, bent over to catch his words, as in broken accents, he continued, "If Ephraim forgive not this—step in, pity, to me—this good man—the pastor of my brethren—will be thy friend. There is a sweet spot—in Passyunk—towards the waters of the Manyunk*—where I thought to be happy with thee. It is now thine—and all else I have—thou wilt repay the kindness of this—good man, and—forgive the—poor Indian." He sank back exhausted, for a few minutes. The weeping girl bathed his temples, and her gentle touch seemed again to revive him.

"Nay, weep not, dearest," he said, "I would call thee mine—by a holier name—before I depart—and we shall meet—hereafter in the bright world—where sects are unknown."

The pastor took the hand of the trembling Ruth, and placed it in that of her lover; "You will not refuse his last wish, lady? Your hearts are already united, and this holy tie will shield you from all blame in watching by his dying pillow. A portion of the simple form of your own people can be united with ours, and my household will be witnesses." He then left the room, but soon returned, accompanied by some members of his family.

* * * * * * *

It was a mournful bridal: a benevolent looking female and two other persons with Secane stood grouped at the foot of the couch. The solemn words were spoken which united Ruth and Eric, and with a faint sigh, in which joy and sorrow were blended, he sunk again on the pillow.

* * * * * * *

Late in the evening of the day of Ruth's departure, Ephraim and his son returned to the cave, and were surprised at her absence. Fatigued by their little journey, the child soon fell asleep, and Ephraim then sought his sister at the neighboring cottages where he had learned that she had not been seen since the morning, when she was observed entering a boat which proceeded down the river. When he heard this distressing news he uttered no sound of anger, or of sorrow, but returning to the cave, hid in its silent recesses the grief that filled his heart, throwing himself by the side of his sleeping child.

"Thou art all that is left to me, sweet boy," he murmured. "Ruth hath left her kindred for the love of another: unkind sister, now are we indeed lonely. Edith, gentle mother of my boy, thou art not, and Ruth hath forsaken us." Thus passed the sleepless night, but in the morning his look was calm, and he chided the tears of Benjamin. His noble spirit was wounded by Ruth's apparent want of delicacy, and when the good Penn, with others, hastened to soothe and console him, it was evident that this feeling had taken the place of grief in his mind. If Menone had appeared and explained the distressing circumstances which caused Ruth's departure, it would have been different, but the timid girl, fearful of implicating Secane, whose anxiety to hasten to the relief of the stranger at Weccacoe, had won back much of her young heart, delayed the performance of a promise she had given Ruth to tell her brother of the dangerous state of the young Swede.

She sent an old Indian woman to supply her place at the cave, and avoided the presence of one whose smile had formerly sent gladness to her innocent and untutored heart. She had heard him speak of his lost Edith. Once when she expressed her disapprobation of the proposed removal of her tribe, while the spirit of Leni Lenappe flashed in her full dark eye, as she pointed to the grave of her mother, she mildly replied,

"There are more beautiful hunting grounds in the west, and have I not left beyond the Atlantic a grave even more dear than this is to these. Distance cannot dim the memory of those we love."

In a few days, however, that sense of right implanted in every human breast, and always yielded to by the pure in heart, induced her to seek him, and tell, yet with trembling hesitation, the tale of distress, but as neither the name of Secane or his arrows were mentioned, and the sickness of the white man revealed with so much confusion, Ephraim thought it a pretext rather than a real cause of alarm, and blamed Ruth no less. Menone thought his fine features had lost half their beauty by their cold expression, as she contrasted them with Secane's when listening to the same tale, but she forgot how differently it was told.

About three weeks after Ruth's departure, Ephraim stood by the river's side, with the proprietor of the settlement, who spoke to him in a low and soothing tone. Rumors from Weccacoe had reached him, and he had returned a letter from Ruth unopened, for which the good Penn gently censured him. While they thus conversed, a shrill cry rose on the air, and Menone, whom Ephraim had not seen since the time of her imperfect disclosure, ran by with the speed of lightning, followed at a slower pace by the old Chief Tamanè her father. Ephraim looked up, and the proprietor said gently, "Be quiet, child, what has alarmed thee?"

The old Indian stopped, pointing to the river, and making signs of distress, but Menone ran on, exclaiming, "canoe—Benjamin—gone!"—and the alarmed father beheld his adventurous boy in a small boat, drifting rapidly down the stream. Uttering a cry of terror, he rushed along the shore in search of a canoe, followed by the good Penn, who endeavored to soothe his distress and encourage his hopes, but he only answered by groans of anguish, as he saw the distance increase between him and his child, who, now really alarmed, ran to and fro in the frail bark, extending his little arms for relief. Many of the settlers and natives were soon on the shore, and several boats were rowed swiftly to his rescue, but the ebbing tide had already carried the canoe past the island opposite the settlement.

"Benoni! Benoni, child of my sorrow, must I lose thee too?" cried the heart stricken father, "save him, Tamanè," he cried to the old chief, "I had pity on thy child, I saved thy daughter."

Swiftly were the oars plied, but in vain, for the son of Ephraim, whose agitated movements had now overset the canoe was struggling with the waves opposite the settlement of Weccacoe, when a form was seen to plunge into the river, swim rapidly to his rescue, and bear him in safety to the shore. A shout of joy pealed along the river, and the first boat that reached the spot was that containing Ephraim, with the good Penn, Tamanè and Menone. The overjoyed father rushed to embrace his restored child, and then turned to pour out his thanks to his preserver. Why does he start at the pale countenance that met his? The traces of recent illness were on the fine features on which he gazed. The next moment he extended his arms, and Eric Wohlden, the preserver of his child, was folded to the heart of Ephraim. It was indeed he, restored from the brink of the grave by a kind Providence, and the tender nursing of Ruth, and his first walk by the river's side since his illness, brought him to witness the danger, and hasten to the rescue of the son of Ephraim. Though still weak, he was an excellent swimmer, and without waiting to divest himself of his clothes, he plunged into the stream.

"Forgive me, Eric," said the grateful father, "and from this moment be to me as a brother."

"And wilt thou pardon me, Ephraim?" said a sweet voice by his side. He turned, and Ruth wept with joy on her brother's breast.

"Thus may your hearts ever be united, my children," said the good William Penn, "and now we will task the hospitality of our brother of Weccacoe, while our little navigator and friend Eric change their wet garments." Then taking the arm of the pastor, they ascended the bank, followed by the joyous group, among whom, the young adventurer, who had been the cause of so much alarm and subsequent happiness was borne in triumph on the shoulders of Secane, by whose side tripped the light form of the Indian maiden.

* Schuylkill.

Original Sketch.

THE INSULT.

WRITTEN FOR THE UNITED STATES SATURDAY POST.

Towards the close of a summer's day, in the year 17—, a party of gentlemen in the undress uniform of British officers, were seated in front of a country tavern in Virginia, discussing such scraps of news as each had chanced to pick up in the dull neighborhood of country quarters. As they proceeded in their remarks from grave to gay, the laugh and jeer grew frequent, till at last one of them suddenly asked "if they had heard of Frazier's mishap?"

"No, what's that, Hamilton?" was the eager question.

"Oh, nothing but a forged paymaster's order for a hundred pounds."

"Sir, that's false," said a voice.

The officer started as if an adder had stung him—and as his fierce eye rested on the speaker, said, "who are you that gives me the lie?"

"A man, who does not like to hear his friend slandered," replied the offender.

The stranger was a young man dressed in the uniform of the provincial service. He was tall and strongly built, and if not fashioned like Apollo, there was an ease, a manliness in the air, a greatness in the bearing, which, addressing itself to the soul, amply made up for any defect in corporeal beauty—his countenance even in that moment of youthful heat indicated a nature whose spirit was conciliation. His cheek was flushed, and his brow knit with anger as he steadily returned the gaze of the officer, and at times clear and distinct said, "I know Major Frazier, he is an honorable man."

"He may have been yesterday," said the Englishman, handing his card, "but he is now under arrest for the crime I have mentioned. You wear the dress of a gentleman, can you fight like one?"

"My conscience forbids me to fight a duel," said the young man with a faltering voice.

"Then your conscience should have forbidden you to wound the honor of a soldier. I find, Maurice, that our countrymen's opinion of provincial valor is a correct one," said the officer, taking the arm of a companion and walking down the road, "who would have thought that that man was a coward?"

The rest of the group after indulging their contempt in sneers, turned their backs on the offender, and resumed their conversation.

They had continued talking for some time, when a slight groan attracted their attention to the stranger. He was leaning against a tree which stood at a short distance from him. His arms were folded on his breast, and his face was pale and slightly convulsed with emotion.

One of the group left his companions and approached him—but at the sound of his footstepe struck the ear of the stranger, he raised his head, and saluting the Englishman, passed on.

The officer, an elderly man, returned to the group, saying, as he seated himself—"That lad is no coward, I'll stake my knowledge of the human character upon it."

* * * * * * *

Let us go to the chamber of the stranger. Seated in an arm chair, his head resting on his hand—the conflict of feelings are plainly visible in the disturbed and changing "mirror of the soul." Now pale with the struggle, now flushed and distended with indignation, and again calm and serene as the light of benevolence sheds its influence over his spirit.

As the war of emotion subsided, he raised his head, and his eye resuming its intellectual expression glanced upon a miniature case that lay upon the table.

He seized it eagerly and gazing on the features of his mother—"joy brightened his crest," and the lamp of wisdom was lighted.

The miniature was that of a woman in middle life, dressed in the style of George the Third's time. The features resembled those of the stranger, and the expression ripe with charity seemed to woo affliction with its charms.

As the stranger gazed, memory brought up the scenes of his childhood, his tears fell fast, and as the lessons of his youth were presented to his vision, he bent his knee and poured forth his spirit in prayer.

* * * * * * *

At daybreak several officers were seen in the gap of the woods near the village of M——. Among them were Hamilton and a young man whose flaxen curls and fine complexion told his Saxon origin. He was apparently about sixteen years of age, and was loading pistols for Hamilton, who fired them at a mark.

"A good shot," said the youth, as he took the discharged pistol from his principal and handed him another. "That's a very good shot, Hamilton, but you must strike out the ace before he comes, we have ten minutes yet. I know he's prepared, for I heard the crack of his pistols as I passed his quarters this morning."

"It all depends upon you, Walter, for I never miss the mark unless the loading is ill done. But I wonder what changed the young fellow's mind!"

"Why, the sense of disgrace to be sure—what else do you think would change conscience into courage? But it's a pity he should die," said the youth, thoughtfully. "I date say before he has flashed his sword!"

"Why, Walter, you yourself, if I remember rightly, have never been in battle, if we except that skirmish with the red skins, were there was more bullets spent than blood spilt. But as you say, if my hand be as steady as it is now, I shall send the young fellow to his long account. A more unprovoked insult a man never received."

At this moment the stranger was seen coming towards them, leaning on the arm of a friend. As he approached many remarks were made on his bearing and soldierly appearance.

"I say, Morrison, he doesn't seem to be much scared," said a young man with dark whiskers and a moustache.

"Eh! no," replied the person addressed, apparently a military coxcomb, "tall, eh, make a nice grenadier?"

"He looks pale, though depend upon it he isn't used to this sort of thing," said the youthful second, with the air of a man who was.

Hamilton smiled, and laying his hand kindly on the young man's shoulder said, "And I hope, Walter, that you'll never earn the character of a duellist, it neither lengthens a man's days nor sweetens the cup of life. I have killed one man in a duel, and shall probably kill another—acts that establish bitter feelings in the heart."

The youth looked hard as the man of war thus moralized, then proceeded silently to select a spot for the expected meeting.

As he was leaving the group the stranger approached—and bowing coldly to his antagonist, he turned his face to the sun, while his second proceeded with Walter to arrange matters.

After the ground had been measured, the combatants took their stations eight paces apart.

When the word was about to be given, and the bystanders expected to see one or both fall immediately, the stranger raised his hand, and said, "stop, I have something to say, Lieutenant Hamilton, I accused you of falsehood—your statement was true—I have wronged you, sir, and I ask your pardon."

For a second the surprise of the party closed their lips. Even the young coxcomb opened his eyes slightly, then ejaculated "possible!" and smiled graciously with the rest as the generous soldier grasped the hand of the stranger, and said, "Mr. Washington, I have never before encountered so truly brave a man."

Ladies' Department.

THE LADY'S DREAM.

The lady lay in her bed,
Her couch so warm and soft,
But her lips was restless and broken still
For troubled was her mind.
From side to side, she muttered and moaned
And tossed her arms aloft.

At last she started up,
And gazed on the manat air,
With a look of awe, as if she saw
Some dreadful phantom there—
And then in the pillow she buried her face
From visions ill to bear

The very curtain shook,
Her terror was so extreme,
And the light that fell on the broider'd quilt
Kept a tremulous gleam.
And her voice was faltering and shook as she cried,
"Oh me! that awful dream!

"That weary, weary walk,
In the church-yard's dismal ground!
And those horrible things, wch shady wings
That came and flitted round.
Death, death, and nothing but death
In every sight and sound!

"And oh! those maiden young,
Who wrought in that dreary room,
With figures drooping and spectres thin,
And shadows for life in gloom;
And voice that cried, 'For the pump of pride,
We haste to an early tomb'

"For the pump and pleasure of pride,
We toil like weary slaves,
And only to earn a house at last,
Where yonder cypress waves;
And then for product! I never saw
A ground so full of graves.'

"And still the coffins came,
With their narrowful trains and slow,
Coffin after coffin still,
A sad and sickening show,
From grief exempt, I never had dreamt
Of such a World of Woe!

"Of the hearts that daily break,
Of the tears that hourly fall
Of the many, many troubles of life
That genre this earthly ball—
Disease, and Hunger, Pain and Want,
But now I dreamp of them all!

"For the blind and the cripple were there,
And the blind and the cripple I saw;
And the homeless man, and the widow poor
Who begged—to bury the dead!
The naked, alas, that I might have clad,
The famished I might have fed!

"The sorrow I might have soothed,
And the unregarded tears
Fer many a drooping shape was there,
From long forgotten years
Aye, even the poor rejected Moor,
Who raised my childish fears

"Each pleading look that long ago
I scanned with a trembling eye
Each face was gazing as plainly there,
As when I passed it by.
Woe, woe, for me if the past should be
Thus present when I die.

"No sweet hope of a celestial rest,
No seed of deep peace,
But only that crowd of human kind
Who wanted pity and alms—
In everlasting retribution—
Will wring my sinful soul!

"Alas! I have walked through life
Too heedless where I trod
Nay, helping to trample my fellow worm,
And fill the burial sod—
Forgetting that even the sparrow falls
Not unmark'd of God!

"I drank the richest draughts,
And ate whatever is good—
Fish and flesh, and fowl, and fruit,
Supplied my hungry mood,
But I never remembered the wretched ones
That starve for want of food!

"I dressed as the noble dress,
In silk and silver and gold,
With silk, and satin, and costly furs,
To many an simple fold;
But I never remembered the naked limbs
That froze with winter's cold.

"The wounds I might have healed!
The human sorrow and smart!
And yet I never stay in my soul
To play so ill a part.
But evil is wrought by want of Thought,
As well as that of Heart!"

She clasp'd her fervent hands,
And the tears began to stream,
Longer and fainter, and fast they fell,
Remorse was so extreme;
And yet, oh yet, that many a Dame
Would dream the Lady's Dream!—

Hood's Magazine

FEMALE EQUESTRIANISM.

BY MISS E. LESLIE.

Medical gentlemen have frequently asserted that no species of recreation is so well calculated to improve the health, as exercise on horseback; and it is certainly a matter of surprise, in a country like ours, where almost every family can command the use of a horse or two, that this healthful practice should be so much neglected. A few years ago, there were even fewer female equestrians than at present; a lady in a riding-dress, mounted on horseback, was a rare exhibition—the practice having, somehow, fallen into disrepute. But, during the present season, the ladies have made rapid progress towards placing equestrianism among the essential accomplishments of American females. And this is as it should be. Independent of its beneficial influence in a medical point of view, there is no accomplishment so well adapted to exhibit a fine figure to advantage. I have frequently heard gentlemen remark that a lady never appeared to better advantage than when mounted upon a fine animal.

Ladies residing in cities should accustom themselves to this exercise, as, from their sedentary mode of life, and the confined atmosphere in which they live, it is of more importance to them than to ladies of the country. The great disadvantage under which nearly every young lady in the city labors, is the want of a competent person to instruct her how to manage her horse. This inconvenience is not felt in the country, where almost every female has been trained to be a rider from her childhood. Generally the gentleman who rides with the lady in town knows very little more about guiding horses than the lady herself; the latter is thus, in a great measure, thrown upon her own skill, which is sometimes insufficient to extricate her from difficult situations. It would be well to encourage riding schools for the instruction of young ladies, in all the large towns in the Union. These institutions, if properly conducted, would soon make their usefulness apparent. But in the absence of riding schools, ladies should endeavor to make themselves acquainted, as well as they can, with the general principles of managing a horse, before they venture to mount one. Several excellent little books on this subject have recently been published, most of which are replete with sound advice, and deserve an attentive perusal.

The practice is liable to be carried to excess; but it is not probable that American ladies will ever go so far as to follow packs of fox-hounds, like Diana Vernon, or become horse-jockies, like the noted Mrs. Thornton, in England.

Ladies generally delight to ride a pacing horse—the pace being unquestionably the easiest of all gaits to the rider. But all pacing horses are sure to stumble, and some of them will fall flat upon the ground, without the least warning, so that she who rides a pacing animal should be continually on the alert, or she may be unexpectedly precipitated over the horse's head. A racking gait is almost as easy as a pace, and a racking horse is apt to be surefooted. A lady equestrian, unless she knows herself to be skilful, should never mount a horse that stumbles, or that is fretful and skittish. Ladies will also enjoy themselves more by riding at a moderate gait, than by pushing along at a violent gallop. The latter speed makes the exercise fatiguing both to the rider and the animal.

If it can be avoided, a lady should never ride a white horse, because her dress is apt to become disfigured by the loose hairs of the animal, and, moreover, the color is not adapted to make her appear advantageously.

The finest time of the day for riding is from daybreak until breakfast time, and next to this, the evening from about an hour before sun-set until twilight. Morning is much to be preferred, because the dust is then comparatively undisturbed; and it would conduce much to the health of young ladies if they would regularly permit the rising sun to put an extra coat of gilding on their habit buttons, instead of exercising their system by lying late in bed.

There is no article of female apparel more agreeable to the eye than a handsome riding-dress. In the selection of the materials and trimmings for a habit, a lady has an opportunity of displaying her good taste in an eminent degree. It is essential that a riding habit should combine chasteness and beauty of style with a due degree of gayety, and it is in adjusting the exact proportions of the latter quality that the lady's taste is put to the test. Cloth is generally preferred, on account of its superior durability; but cachemerette, merino, and other woollen fabrics are by no means unfashionable. The color of a habit should be selected with a view to its producing a good contrast with the complexion. There are some rules to determine this matter, which will be found in Mrs. Walker's well-known book. A lady having round features and a rosy complexion, will look to decided advantage in blue cloth, while one with a sharp, pale visage will look best in a habit of some light color, such as slate, gray or purple. Green is also a handsome color to contrast with a fresh complexion; while a fair face will always appear advantageously when the habit is black, with a proper relief on the corsage.

In cutting a habit, the main object to be sought for, is a neat and close, but at the same time comfortably setting corsage. It has been found by experience that the most desirable corsages are those having a rolling collar, opening about half-way down the bust. This style enables the lady to wear a light and neat chemisette, with a small worked or plain collar and kerchief, and thus avoid the stiffness and discomfort of a buckled reaching up to the chin. The skirt should be made nearly three-quarters of a yard longer than that of an ordinary dress, and should be constructed that the front part may be tucked up when desired, to enable the wearer to walk comfortably. When the habit is blue, green, black, or any other dark color, the collar and cuffs should be of blue-black silk velvet, but not otherwise.

As was before remarked, for a lady having a round face and rosy complexion, a habit of blue or green cloth is to be recommended; but it should be made with a rolling velvet collar and cuffs, and be worn with a velvet or cloth cap, and deep green veil. The corsage should have no embroidery, braid or lace, but should be ornamented with two or three rows of fine gilt buttons. Many young ladies are deterred from trimming their habits in this way, by the fear that gilt buttons would give them too dashing an appearance to be in good taste. This, however, is a wrong view of the case. In order to try a real riding dress is so rare an article, that many persons have no opportunity of forming a correct idea of their styles; hence, when a habit is a little gayer than a walking dress, many regard it as a sort of taste. It should be borne in mind that the whole costume of a lady equestrian is necessarily more fanciful than a mere street dress, and that a few rows of bright buttons do not make a greater show than a heavy gold chain, which is always worn without exciting a remark of disapprobation. A habit of dark goods has a very dull appearance, unless relieved by some style of trimming which is at once chaste and showy. During the present season, gilt buttons have been more extensively worn on habits than at any previous period within the recollection of the present generation. They were introduced by ladies of well-known good taste, and their popularity is evident from the fact that they are worn on three-fourths of the habits that meet our sight. But there is such a thing as carrying the use of gilt buttons to excess. They should always be worn on habits of blue and green, and they look well on black and purple; but they ought never to be put on slate, gray, fawn, or other light mixed colors. They make no good contrast on mixed goods; on blue cloth they are incompatibly rich.

In selecting the buttons for a habit, care should be used to get those that are the richest treble gilt. Sometimes figured gilt buttons are worn, and occasionally we see the convex or "Elbiler button" on habits; but neither of these are to be recommended;—the first are gaudy for boys' clothes, and the latter remind one of brass trunk nails. The gilt buttons worn by ladies of acknowledged taste, have a plain flat surface, and are of rather a small size. This pattern is the only fashionable one; the appearance of the button is chaste in the highest degree, while its mirror-like surface makes it show to better advantage than any other pattern. These buttons, instead of giving the habit a dashing appearance, barely serve to relieve its sombre look—imparting to it, at the same time an air of beauty and neatness that needs to be seen to be appreciated.

For a very delicate lady, the habit ought to be of light colored goods made in the style last named, except that the collar and cuffs should not be velvet, and the buttons sought either to be black silk, or moulds covered with the material that composes the habiliee. This style of habit will be found most becoming; but if the lady desires something more showy, she might wear black cloth, but not blue or green. Black cloth will contrast handsomely with her complexion; and if she desires to wear gilt buttons, the habit should be made with a jacket and skirt—the jacket kept habitually unbuttoned, so as to show a buff cassimere vest underneath. The vest should have the military cut, and be adorned with a single row of gilt buttons, extending from the neck to the waist. The jacket, unless particularly desired otherwise, should have black silk buttons.

The cap should always be black, with a smart visor, and to be secured to the head by a narrow ribaud tied under the chin. The practice of wearing plumes is rapidly becoming extinct; but it is undeniable that they continue still in favor among many ladies of undoubted taste. Veils of green are to be recommended generally. The color protects the eyes in the sun. When the habit is dark, the gloves should be buff, or some other lively color; but with a light habit, gloves of any color are becoming. The sleeves of a habit should be moderately tight, and no buttons are recommended for the cuffs. It has been the practice of some ladies to load the hem of the skirt with shot, to keep it to its place when riding; but it is by no means considered necessary to pursue the custom any further. The chemisette may be graced with a neat little breastpin, and the kerchief should be very small, with a neat figure, and have the collar turned down over it.

Before dismissing the subject, it is proper to say that some ladies prefer the riding dress known by the name of the Spencer habit. This costume is of French origin. It consists of a silk velvet spencer, with a separate skirt of merino. The colors most worn are maraschino-blue, dark green, and blue-black—skirt of the same color. The spencer is made with a rolling collar, sets close to the shape, and has three rows of buttons in front. Silk buttons are sometimes worn on the spencer, but they do not look so well as gilt. The advantage of this dress consists in its admirable adaptation to the ballroom, by merely wearing a light skirt with it.

A broadcloth habit will cost twice as much as one of merino or cachemerette; but it will be far more durable, and is suited to every season of the year. A lady will, therefore, consult economy by selecting cloth as the material.

The practice of riding should be generally encouraged by parents. It will give a healthy tone to the constitution of their daughters, and make them more useful members of society, than they ever can be by frequenting midnight dancing parties, and lolling on their couches during the day.

Selected Tales.

THE MISER OUTWITTED.

A Tale of a Man About Town.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "YANKEE NOTIONS."

How old Boxall, the miser, became a generous man in spite of his teeth, is a story which I have some scruple about telling, lest misers should remember it and be upon their guard: these worthy gentlemen are so sharp at taking hints. I therefore recommend to the patrons of this journal, to be particularly careful how they lend the present number. With this precaution we may be pretty safe. So here it is.

Mr. Benjamin Boxall was as respectable a man as you shall see in a summer's day, especially in any part of the town where good bargains were to be made. What signified it that he starved his wife to death, and would spit a straw to save his own half? Wasn't he worth three hundred thousand dollars, and in good notes, too, not one upon change? He was formerly of the firm of Baggs & Boxall, Ship Chandlers, No. 418 State street, Boston, all the patrons of which respectable house were men of substance and reputation, and carried a "high head and a clean collar," as the phrase used to be.

Mr. Boxall "knew what money was worth;" a species of knowledge on which the possessor commonly pride themselves with a high degree of self-complacency. He had, indeed, ample reason to be proud of his own talent, for the beginnings of his greatness were precisely of such a nature as to show that no ordinary genius was at work in directing his career. He became first known to the world in a public capacity by selling pop on the Common, in the good old times when matters of pop had not yet encountered the majestic expansion of penal statutes. In this wide field of action he picked up money enough to lift him into the more elevated sphere of old iron. The trade in old iron sharpened his wits at such a degree, that in three years' time, he made a bold push, and set at once into the victualling line. Here he balanced his accounts at the end of five years more, with such a preponderance of pockets that he made another courageous swing, and launched into the great ocean of business. All went fair that came into his net. He became well known up and down town, and every body saw that he "understood what he was about"—an expressive and significant phrase in the mercantile world, that will affect the heart more than a learned philosopher would imagine. Need I say more? The long and short of the matter is, that he awoke one fine morning, and found himself—rich!

Did I say that Mr. Boxall knew what money was worth? If I said no more than this, I did not say half enough. He not only knew the worth of it, but he had so high an opinion of its value, that he thought nothing of so much money being locked up in his safe. He did business in a terrible snug way; never took a note of hand without two good endorsers, and charged compound interest whenever it was perfectly safe. These are only prudent precautions, which careful people find highly conducive to their own comforts; although men of scanty means and small connections are apt to complain of them as a little embarrassing. However, what of this? Money was money. Mr. Boxall was a man who "understood what he was about," and he did not understand why he should run risks without a "consideration."

This worthy old gentleman's only son Joe had grown up in a style that caused the old man strange fits of uneasiness at times. Joe was placed in what philosophers call "a false position;" that is, he expected much and got little—a state of probation, which, if not false in its moral consequences, is at least a surely vexatious enough, in all conscience. He was already of an age to be doing something for himself. Yet not a sixpence would old Boxall advance to set him up in trade—so hard was he upon his only son, and so loth was he to part with the money on which he had so long lived. It was enough, he thought, for him to pay Joe's tailor and shoemaker; and even this he could not do without most dismal grumbling.

It is astonishing to see how differently old people and young people act on the subject of money, for my part I never could understand it. If the old folks who have got money could only be made to think like the young folks who want money, how many awkward family discords would be saved! However, all this moralizing won't help on my story.

"Five dollars for boots! Monstrous! monstrous! Joe, how can you be so extravagant!"

"Extravagant!" echoed Joe, while old Boxall was puckering his little pinched-up features into a scowl of peculiar sourness and vexation, as he looked over a scrap of paper with "rec'd pay" at the bottom.

"I say extravagant—monstrous extravagant—these hard times, too! Don't Waxem & Co. advertise boots at ten-and-sixpence? Look at the newspapers."

"Horseshide—shabby horseshide—won't stand an hour's walking," replied Joe, turning up his nose.

"Walking! what's the use of walking? There's another extravagance—wearing out she-leather, and all that. Didn't I see you smoking a Spanish cigar, yesterday!"

"Perhaps so—I do smoke Havanas sometimes."

"Extravagance, I say again. Can't afford it. Give a long-nine—just as good. I never smoke at all—mere extravagance. What's this? House-bill! Bless my whits! you didn't have a horse and chaise, Joe!"

"Why, don't you know, sir, the ball at Col. Swagger's? There were ladies, you see—couldn't do without a coach."

"Ladies! with a witness! Three dollars twenty-five cents, as I live! Joe! Joe! what sort of profit is there in such a trade as this?"

"Ah! father, that is just what I was going to speak to you about. I've had it in my mind a long while. There is a lady in the case. Young men, you know, must live—"

"Yes, live and learn, Joe, live and learn!"

"I was going to say that they must live and marry. Now you know I have set my heart upon—"

"Living prudently, I hope."

"Yes, and taking a wife!"

"Hey!"

"Exactly so—keeping house will be so economical!"

"Ay, Joe, but be sure and look out for a good match; don't marry foolishly, Joe."

"My sentiments exactly! You have expressed my mind to a T. I wouldn't marry foolishly on any account; it is entirely contrary to my inclination."

"I'm glad to hear of it, Joe; I hope you'll imitate your father, and always look out for the main chance; I always looked out for the main chance."

"Certainly, certainly. Now my wife—that is, the lady that is to be my wife—is beyond all doubt, the finest woman, the most accomplished, sweetest, most domestic, most excellent and charming creature—it will be so happy a union!"

"How much is her father worth?" asked old Boxall, taking up a pen, with a regular business look, and preparing a scrap of paper for figures.

"Got no father—died in the West Indies."

"Mother!"

"Not mother, either."

"Ah!" said the old man, with a look of visible satisfaction, "then all the property is in her own hands."

"No—she's got no property."

Old Boxall was just poking his nose down to the paper to cast the interest on the amount of the lady's fortune, when this altogether unexpected announcement caused him to jerk his head upward, and fix his little calculating grey eyes on Joe's face without uttering a word. What surprise he felt at his son's unaccountable folly in falling in love with a woman who had no property! At length, he would have spoken, but Joe had found time to rally his strength, during the short suspension, and followed up this astounding disclosure with something still more audacious.

"And so, sir," said the son, "considering that we can't live on nothing, and you can easily spare it—I only want—say a small matter of twenty thousand dollars, to begin housekeeping with."

Suppose, gentle reader, a snow storm should burst upon you on the Fourth of July, and cool your dinner-table patriotism with the frigidity of Hudson's Bay; suppose a thunderbolt should break out of the blue sky; suppose Deacon Slouch, the tee-totaller, should walk into Whatd'ye-call-em's, and call for whiskey punch; suppose Congress should mind their business; suppose a tailor should be punctual; suppose a tin-pedlar should be honest; suppose anything in rerum natura utterly incredible and astounding; but you cannot suppose or imagine any thing that would overwhelm you with so much astonishment, as that which fell upon the amazed Mr. Boxall at these words. He sat with the forefinger of his left hand firmly planted on the paper before him, the pen clenched in his right, and raised in mid air. With open mouth and fixed eyeballs, he continued to gaze upon the young gentleman, who stood before him, actually frightened at his own audacity in speaking of such a thing as twenty thousand dollars to his father's face. At length the old man found words.

"The boy's distracted! Twenty thousand dollars! Oh, he's certainly distracted."

"No such thing, father. Won't you have two hundred and eighty thousand left?"

"Oh, nonsense, nonsense! I know the way young folks talk. Twenty thousand dollars! just as if it was no more than a musquito-bite."

"Then you won't let me have it?"

"Have it? what—twenty thousand? Bless my wits! No! consider! twenty thousand dollars these hard times?"

"Then, for heaven's sake, father, what am I to do?"

"Don't know, Joe—none of my business; hard work enough for me to get a living, these days; lost five hundred dollars last week, by the failure of Sam Slump—fool enough to take his note without any collateral. Mind, Joe, never take a note without a good collateral."

"That's neither here nor there, father; will you let me have the money?"

"Can't think of such a thing; twenty thousand dollars! ugh, ugh! Bless my wits! can't do it to save my life!"

"Then I shall go mad, or hang myself," cried Joe, with an air of desperation, and at these words striking his fist upon the table, he rushed out of the house.

Next day Joe did not appear, whereat his loving father was heard to mutter an ejaculation of surprise, as

Biography.

A DAUGHTER OF PHILADELPHIA.

We find in the New Orleans Bulletin, the following honorable testimony, not more laudatory than just, to the memory of one who was well known personally to a large circle of our elder inhabitants, and by the reputation of her good works to all Philadelphians.

Mrs. Phebe Hunter, relict of the late Dr. George Hunter, was born in the county of Philadelphia, in the year 1760—she was of the family of Bryanis, long and most favorably known in the annals of that time honored city; and she belonged to the denomination of Christians known as Friends. At an early period of her married life, it was her happiness, as she has been often heard to remark, to be intimately acquainted with Dr. Franklin, who was a "next door neighbor" and friend of her husband; and many of her friends have delighted to believe that much of her own practical wisdom and proverbial good sense, may have received early bias, encouragement, and strength, from associations so honored and so elevated, and that the seeds thus early sown in good ground, soon sprung up, yielding more than a hundred fold.

Dr. Hunter is known to have been distinguished for his general intelligence and enterprise, which were successfully developed in early and intrepid voyages to the coasts of Mexico, and to different islands in the West Indies.

His forecast early satisfied him of the advantages and importance to his family of residence in New Orleans, and he arrived there with his family just at the period when the banners of Peace floated over the standard of Louisiana, and he survived nearly ten years honored and respected.

The distinguished features of the character of Mrs. Hunter were sincerity and simplicity, and so beautifully were they displayed in every word and deed of her life, that they at once attracted and surrounded her with the affections of the young, and the admiration of the aged; and it was her happiness and singular good fortune to preserve this enviable and elevated position, throughout her long and well spent life.

Over a being thus constituted the most benevolent impulses may well be supposed to have exercised a constant and controlling influence, and hence it is known that shortly after she came to this city, she interested herself and friends in the establishment of a Female Orphan Society, since known as the Poydras Female Orphan Asylum—and from that period almost to the day of her death, she literally consecrated her life to the welfare of the Institution. It was her holy office, as it aptly expressed in the Constitution of the Society, "to seek out and examine into the circumstances and claims of indigent Orphans and Widows," and thousands nourished by her bounty, saved from ruin by her example and counsel, and efficient aid, have risen up to call her blessed! It is not trespassing on the boundaries of truth and propriety to express the opinion that the impulse thus given by Mrs. Hunter has since caused the establishment and incorporation in the city of New Orleans, of five other asylums for the relief of the destitute orphans, of whom more than one hundred surrounded her remains, and in sadness and in tears gazed for the last time on the loved face of her whom they had only known as a mother.

Her singleness of heart and uniform consistent devotion to the great cause of benevolence, were not, with her, sudden impulses; nor were they alone displayed in this city of her adoption. The same holy zeal and well directed efforts had been displayed in Philadelphia, where her name, always associated and always engaged in every benevolent enterprise, was so extensively known and reverenced, as in New Orleans.

It is well recollected by the aged inhabitants of Philadelphia, as a historical fact in the annals of that city, that when the Yellow Fever prevailed there as a desolating epidemic, in the years 1793 and '98, Mrs. Hunter was constantly seen, by day and by night, silently visiting, as an angel of mercy, the doors of the poor and friendless invaded by the pestilence, ministering not only with her own hands to the relief and comfort of the suffering, but gratuitously and bountifully distributing, from her own resources, all needful aid, to those forms most needed by the suffering and the poor; medical and pecuniary relief were extended and were carried to every house where, within the wide circle of her acquaintance, there was poverty or distress.

The memory of this excellent lady is embalmed in the hearts of a host of surviving friends. To them all, it has been a source of inexpressible gratification, that while her life was prolonged beyond the usual limit of human existence, her health, until a very recent period, had been uninterruptedly good—that her mental faculties were unclouded, and that her usefulness, both in action and in counsel, was continued unbroken, until the silver cord was loosed and the golden bowl at the fountain broken; and that then, as they humbly hope, her spirit returned to God who gave it!

The following resolutions were passed at a meeting of the Poydras Orphan Asylum:

A special meeting of the "Female Orphan Society," of this city, was convened at the Poydras Asylum, Jan. 11th, 1844, for the purpose of commemorating the great loss the Society has sustained in the death of its able and beloved President, Mrs. Hunter. The meeting being called to order, the following preamble and resolutions were submitted by Mrs. Mary Lizenbing, and unanimously adopted by the Board:

Whereas, it has pleased the Almighty, in his wisdom, to remove from this Society its chief ornament and guide, from the desolate orphan a friend and mother, and from this community a bright example, by the death of our beloved venerated First Directress, we, therefore, in humble acquiescence to that Almighty fiat, this day assembled round this board, (so often cheered by her presence and counsel,) to commemorate her virtues, and to deplore this afflictive dispensation—to lament that we shall no more be aided by her judicious guidance, her affectionate counsel, no more be cheered by her meek and gentle presence.

The simplicity and truth of her character, her strength of judgment, her untiring perseverance in well doing, her single-heartedness, and devotion to the afflicted portion of the human family, place her character in bright relief before this community, where, for a period of nearly thirty years, her unobtrusive, yet effective works of mercy and charity, have caused her memory to be venerated, and associated with all that is bright and holy in our nature, and to be embalmed in thousands of humble hearts, from which arose daily aspirations to that common Father and Friend (who seeth when a sparrow falls) for blessings upon her and those who were dear to her.

But, neither the orphan's prayer, the aspirations of the humble, the sincerity of filial devotion, the respect and admiration of thousands, could all "avert the inevitable hour." She has finished her course, and rests from her labors, the place that has known her, shall know her no more!

To us, who have enjoyed the privilege of her society and confidence, the memory of that pure, bright character, bearing the stamp of truth and christian love, shall be a talisman to the faithful discharge of our duties, not only in this responsible trust, but in all the duties of life—"They mourn the dead who live as they desire." Therefore, be it

Resolved, That this Society deplore the loss of our venerated and beloved First Directress, that we deeply appreciate the many virtues of her character, and that we consider her death a calamity to this Society, to the whole family of orphans, and to this community.

Resolved, That we truly and earnestly sympathize with her afflicted family in this heavy bereavement, and trust that the solemn truth that "their works do follow them," may afford consolation while they mourn the death of the righteous.

Resolved, That these resolutions be inserted in the minutes of our Society, and that a copy be transmitted by the Secretary to the afflicted family of our departed friend.

Published by order of the Board.

C. M. PRITCHARD, Secretary.

COMMODORE KENNEDY.

The following notice of the late Commodore Kennedy, is copied from the Norfolk Beacon.

Commodore Kennedy was born in Dorchester county, on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, on the 22d of February, 1779, and was of one of the most respectable families of that State. When very young, hardly more than fifteen years of age, being of an enterprising and adventurous spirit, he ran away from home and joined the merchant service, and made several voyages previous to the early part of '98, when he made a voyage with Capt. Flagg, to South America. This gentleman, having been appointed a lieutenant in the navy, carried young Kennedy with him on board the John Adams as an ordinary seaman, where he remained five or six months in the capacity of captain of the fore top, when he was appointed a midshipman, by Capt. Cross. On his arrival at Charleston, in 1801, being ordered to quit the navy, with most of the officers, in consequence of the peace establishment, he re-joined the merchant service as mate of a ship bound to Holland, Captain Prince. On his return he made a voyage to Philadelphia in the ship Packet, Capt. Gardner, whence he sailed as mate for the West Indies, in the sch. Maria, and returned to New York in the brig Eliza and Mary, as commander, the brig belonging to Butler & Wheeler.

After this he made a voyage as mate in an English ship bound to Nova Scotia and St. David's Straits, and thence to the West Indies again, where he was pressed on board a man-of-war, the frigate Amphion, from which he effected his escape and arrived at Philadelphia, some time in 1802 or '3, in the brig Polly, Capt. Lord. In 1803, however, at the instigation of Lieuts. Spence and Maxwell, the latter of whom had been a messmate of his on board the J. Adams, he again entered the navy as gunner's mate on board the U. S. brig Lynx, Capt. Stewart, with fair promises from the officers that they would use their influence to get him advanced, in consideration of his former services, and that they would inform his friends and relatives of his situation. He was in all the attacks upon, and at the bombardment of Tripoli, a volunteer; in the destruction of the frigate Philadelphia in that harbor, and was blown up in the attack upon the batteries on the 4th August, 1804, for his gallantry and coolness on which occasion he was promoted after the action to a midshipman by Capt. Stewart, (now Commodore Stewart,) and in 1839, received a splendid sword from the State of Maryland.

At Syracuse he was transferred to the Essex frigate, and again, in Carthage Bay, he was transferred to the Constitution, under the command, in both ships, of Com. Stewart. In 1805 he returned home to the Washington yard, and received his warrant, through the hands of Capt. Stewart, after which he never acted as a midshipman, but was immediately appointed acting lieutenant by the Secretary of the Navy, with orders to the frigate New York, then lying at Washington. This ship having been put out of commission, he was furloughed for six months, after which he was ordered as first lieut. to the brig Franklin, 12 guns, (J. Earle, commander,) destined for New Orleans, with Capt. J. D. Henley, Major Commack of the marines, and other officers, and a detachment of marines on board for the Orleans station. About this time he was sent by Com. Shaw and Gen. Wilkinson, across Lake Pontchartrain, to make inquiries concerning Col. Burr's movements in that quarter. On his return from this duty he joined the Franklin and sailed for Washington, where he arrived in 1806 '7. But returning to New Orleans almost immediately, in the same vessel, he received orders from Com. Shaw to proceed in a gun boat and survey the coast from the Bayou St. John in Lake Pontchartrain, along the coast and rivers, which he did satisfactorily, and returned in 1808. In 1809 he was ordered by the Secretary of the Navy as first lieut. of the cutter rigged vessel, the "Ferret," 12 guns.

In 1814, he was ordered to report to Com. Perry for the command of one of the brigs belonging to his flying squadron, but having received a short leave from him at New York to make a visit home, before it expired peace was proclaimed between Great Britain and the United States. In 1815, he received a furlough to make an East India voyage, and took command of the brig Brazilian for London. He returned in 1816, and was ordered to Malaga with despatches for Mr. Irvin, in 1817, in the store ship Geo. Long, bound for Mahon. At Gibraltar he went on board the U. States ship Alert, and eventually took passage in her for Mahon, where he received his commission as commander and was ordered by Com. Chauncey to the command of sloop Alert—and returned in her to the U. States during the same year. In 1818 he was appointed captain of the navy yard, at Gosport.

In 1830, he was ordered to the frigate Brandywine, (Sept.) In Oct., he sailed for the Mediterranean, and upon his arrival at Mahon, was transferred to the frigate Java. 1835, 6, 7, he was in command of the E. I. and Asiatic squadron—and part of '37, for about six months, in command of the Pacific squadron, making a successful cruise round the world, and was relieved by Commodore Ballard in the ship of the line North Carolina. In '38 he was appointed to the ordnance, and '42 received the appointment of port captain of this station, having his flag on board the Pennsylvania, 120, where it now floats at half mast.

Commodore Ken was a remarkable man, in many respects—with the advantage of a highly polished education, it is almost impossible to conceive any pursuit in life in which he might not have attained excellence. His tastes for music, painting, drawing and the fine arts in general, were excellent. He was fertile in expedients, being of an inventive and somewhat speculative order of mind. Fond of reading, and with powers of observation to the several of the variety and extent of his travels contributed also to store his mind with a fund of information on almost every topic.

He possesses the pen of a ready writer, and the eye of a finished painter. He was particularly remarkable for attaching animals of all kinds to him, and in his relations on ship board always carried with him the attachment of his officers, and the devotion of his crew. In his private relations he was irreproachable. He scarcely bore a resentment and was without an enemy. His heart was indeed the cradle of the kindliest affections, where sometimes, too, his better judgment leaning too much was apt to be rocked asleep.

Foreign Intelligence.

THREE DAYS LATER.

By the arrival at New York, of the Havre packet, Silore de Grasse, intelligence three days later has been received from the continent of Europe.

The most important intelligence received is the return of the ex-Queen Christina to Spain. This may be most important intelligence—as her presence in the country was undoubtedly brought about by some movement of a party in Spain—or it may be unimportant intelligence, as before this time she may have gone back again.

There is no news of importance from France. The ministry appears more firmly established than any previous one for many years, and even counts upon permanence for several years to come.

A bill was about to be brought forward, and would probably pass, authorizing the Bank of France to issue notes of the denomination of 250 francs.

A line of French mail steamers was about to be established between Marseilles, Malta, and Alexandria.

The Universal German Gazette states from Bonn, in Prussia, that an address of congratulation to Mr. O'Connell, is getting up in several towns of Germany, and that the lists of names are to be sent to Professor Walter, of Bonn, to be forwarded by him to Mr. O'Connell.

Some arrests are said to have been made, of subalterns in one of the regiments forming the garrison of Paris; but no information is given of the cause.

Subscriptions were talked of, for the purchase of a sword, to be presented to Admiral Dupetit Thouars. The Ministerial papers ridicule the idea.

Accounts from Stockholm, of February 20, were that the King of Sweden was a little better, but his condition was still very precarious.

Letters from Alicant, of February 20, says that the bombardment of the town was commenced, partially on that day. Provisions were becoming scarce, the blockade being kept up, and it was thought that the insurgents would surrender before many days.

A Madrid letter of the 24th states, that the wife of Bonet, the head of the insurrection at Alicant, who resided at Teruel, has been arrested and thrown into a dungeon.

Letters from Goritz of the 24th of February, says that the Duke D'Angouleme had undergone another crisis, the results of which were alarming.

A rumor was current at Vienna of an approaching marriage between the Archduke Stephen, and the Princess Olga, daughter of the Emperor of Russia.

M. de Guernonville, supposed to be the oldest man in Europe, reached his 116th year on the 29th of February. His health was very good.

Intelligence from Bombay, to Feb. 1st, has been received, via Gibraltar. In the month previous, two battles between the British forces and the natives, took place in the Mahrattas district. The Bombay paper says

The enemy were the first to commence hostilities, by firing on the baggage party under Col. Sleeman, on the 26th of Dec., and then on a reconnoitering party sent out on the 28th. The right wing of our army, under the immediate command of his Excellency Sir H Gough, attacked the Mahrattas in their position of Maharajpool, while our left wing under Major General Grey, did so at Punniar, and gained a completo victory over them. Our loss, however, on these occasions, has been very severe—the list amounting to 141 killed and 866 wounded; that of the enemy amounts to between 4,000 and 5,000 in killed and wounded, with the loss of 50 pieces of artillery.

The fort of Gwalior shortly after surrendered to us, and some of the principal chiefs came in and tendered submission.

In Scinde, matters are much the same. The troops, however, are recovering from their sickness, at Hyderabad little improvement had been observed; but at Sukkur the condition of our men was much more favorable. India throughout is peaceful.

Our China intelligence reaches to the 28th of December, but is of little interest

United States SATURDAY POST.

EDITED AND PUBLISHED BY SAMUEL D. PATTERSON & CO.

Philadelphia: SATURDAY MORNING, APRIL 13, 1844.

NEW PREMIUMS.

To any person sending TWO DOLLARS in advance, we will send the United States Saturday Post for one year, and one of the late novels.

For FIVE DOLLARS, three copies of the United States Saturday Post, and one of the new novels.

For TEN DOLLARS, eight copies of the United States Saturday Post, and either of the new novels.

For TWENTY DOLLARS, seventeen copies of the United States Saturday Post, and two novels.

For FIVE DOLLARS, one copy of the United States Saturday Post, one copy of Graham's Magazine, and one copy of the Ladies' National Magazine.

For TEN DOLLARS, three copies of the United States Saturday Post, two copies of Graham's Magazine, and two copies of the Ladies' National Magazine.

Mr. J. R. Welden is our Agent at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania.

OUR WEEKLY GOSSIP.

He must be an ascetic indeed, who cannot enjoy such lovely weather as we have "at this present writing," always provided that his tabernacle is in healthy condition, and the keeper of his household, Master Conscience, not in arrears. It is the season for enjoyment. The bilious complaints of January, and the month or two following, are over, and as we have ceased, with the winter, to look back at last year's summer and autumn, so have we forgotten last year's bills. The blood bounds with a freer motion through the veins—the heart is lifted in sympathy with the vernal music—hope looks forward to the fast approaching delights of early fruits and flowers, and we poor cits just give the pavements a heartier stamp as we go over them, and think of the week or two we are to have in the country by and bye. Happy they who can always live where the pleasures of the season come to them, instead of being obliged to pack themselves like merchandize, and be shaken over iron roads, or steamed in sea-sick-ish, cook-shop-ish boats, in pursuit of a peep at "nature unadorned"—trees not clipped by system—paths not laid out in geometric diagrams—flowers not stuck in pots—milk-maids, cows, calves, hens, and fresh eggs and new milk! Oh! like Mr. Willis's heroine in one of the best of his Magazine sketches—we "were born to love pigs and chickens," and our vocation comes most distinctly over us when—the weather is pleasant! The cows and squirrels may at other times keep the country, and we would not dispute their possession, though rough and smooth, bitter and sweet, stormy and pleasant, the "general average" is vastly in favor of the cheerful competence and manly independence of the Farmer.

It is almost too early to be talking of next Fall's crops, and yet we find some of our country newspaper contemporaries are promising us good ones, already. Nobody with half a soul, however, could do less than prophesy well, in the Spring. It is the time of promise, and faithless curmudgeons who do not participate in its sentiment, ought to live in Nova Zembla, or some other place where the climate would be in sympathy with their dispositions.

Among things agreeable, one of the most pleasant is the discovery which appears to have been made abroad, and which, still better has been made and is now felt at home, that Pennsylvania has neither sunk nor evaporated; that she has not disappeared bodily, nor slipped away in detachments—but the sound, sturdy, honest, enterprising old Key Stone State, is here yet. Her coal, and iron, and marble, and manufactures, her thrifty and industrious people, her decided and constant American feeling, will probably be taken a little more into calculation now, in estimating the value of the dollar in her promises. Slow in coming it may have been, but it will most assuredly be found in the end to overrun rather than fall below the hundred cents. The disposition shown by our Legislature not to go home until their work is done, is earnest of the intentions of the people, as represented in their legislators, and the thoughtful and sagacious have no longer a doubt of the taking of prompt measures to defend the character, and substantiate the solvency of the Commonwealth.

That tangled "skein of yarn," the Texan annexation question is still undecided; and the entire paper could not contain all the contradictory rumors, and stories, pertinent and impertinent, which are in circulation respecting the matter. A most economical and penurious stratum of fact serves a Washington rumor-monger for the base of a large structure of rumor—all of which "can be relied upon," and the reader is driven to the conclusion of King James, of pedantic memory, concerning lawyers in his day—that these "reliable rumors" are uttered by people who lie and relie all round. All cannot be right. Who is wrong?

There is no doubt that Mr. Tyler, himself, makes the measure a pet one, and it is asserted that he even intends to be put in nomination on Texas and Oregon. The cabinet are said, three of them, at least, to favor the measure. In the shape of a treaty it cannot pass the present Senate and in no shape do the politicians wish the matter forced upon them until after the next Presidential election. Meanwhile Texas is as busy as her friends in the United States. One plan in agitation there is to join Arkansas or Louisiana, and then claim admission into the Union, as part and parcel of the Union, wrongfully alienated. But there is another scheme in Texas for settling the trouble at once, and expeditiously. They, the Texans, to wit, say that in case our Senate refuses to ratify the bill for annexation, that the Senate of Texas will at once annex the United States to that republic. As there is no such thing as getting round a movement of this kind, we must look upon the question as settled; and no Presidential candidate can make or lose capital by such a disposition.

DRY DOCK.

With the strong claims of this city to the establishment of a Dry Dock here, it is very strange that Congress has never yet seen fit to do its duty in making the appropriation and authorizing the work. A minority of the Committee on Naval Affairs have made a report in which they declare their belief that it is expedient for the government to build a dry dock at this port, and show some very conclusive reasons for such a conviction. As a general proposition they believe that an efficient naval service requires a dry dock, at least for repair, at each of the principal navy yards, but there are urgent reasons, independent of this, why one should be built at Philadelphia. It is the only inland station in the country, and therefore the only one secure from sudden attacks from hostile fleets. The public records also prove the superiority and excellence of the workmanship at this navy yard, the cheapness of the labor, the skill of the mechanics, and the successful construction of many of the best ships in the service. On the score of economy alone, a matter which ought to commend itself to the members who are so zealous for retrenchment, a dry dock should be built here. There are other reasons of as much force, such as the purity of the water, a protection from the worm, the depth of water amply sufficient for vessels of the largest size, and the intermediate position of the Philadelphia yard between Norfolk and Charlestown, which have all been repeatedly urged and never denied, which render this one of the most desirable places in the Union for constructing such a public work.

A GREAT INSTITUTION.

We learn from the Boston Transcript, that the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association has purchased the Mansion House and Scott Estate in Bowdoin Square, for the sum of $46,000 for the purpose of the erection of a hall for the uses of the Association and for other purposes. The estate comprises about 17,000 feet of land; and could not be in better hands for the public benefit.

DEATH OF PROFESSOR SANDERSON.

A sudden chill of sorrow was thrown over the large circle of the friends and admirers of John Sanderson, when on Friday week the unexpected announcement of his death met the eye in the public print. Hardly a week before, his familiar smile had exchanged greetings with the many to whose daily salutations his welcome face was more than that of a mere acquaintance. Once to know him was to feel toward him as a friend—and though the even current of his life was too placid to give him space in the actual bustle of the age—yet the unobtrusive gentleman—the modest scholar—the charming wit—the kind and amiable man, seemed more a necessary part of the daily world than those who challenge the attention and admiration which came to him unsought.

Mr. Sanderson was a native of Carlisle, in this State. At the time of his decease he was professor of Classics in the Central High School. He was a thorough scholar, and had made his erudition minister to the study of the English tongue. He had a work in preparation on the etymology and history of the English language, which was looked for with great expectation by those who knew his eminent fitness for the work. He had also in contemplation a work of a lighter cast, to be called "The American in London," intended as a counterpart to his "American in Paris," published some years ago, together with several other projects of a literary character. But death has put a sudden stop to all his earthly labors. He died at his residence in Schuylkill Seventh street, near Locust, on the morning of the 5th, after a brief illness of less than a week, aged 58 years.

Among the many notices which this event has called forth, we have seen none more beautiful and appropriate than the following in the Philadelphia Gazette. The initials will readily be recognised as those of a gentleman probably better acquainted with American authors and American literature, than any other man in this country.

John Sanderson was a man of genius, a man of talent, a man of feeling. He was a Philadelphian, and by his life and writings he added to the good reputation of his country. To natural abilities of a high order, he united a calm chaste scholarship, an intimate knowledge of mankind, a singularly amiable disposition, and a frank and high bred courtesy. His departure is lamented not alone by those who enjoyed his society and his friendship; he is mourned by our republic of letters; America, as well as our city, has lost one of her most accomplished sons.

Mr. Sanderson has long been known as a writer. His first publication was the collection of Memoirs of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence, in nine octavo volumes—a work embracing a vast amount of original and authentic information; and his last, excepting contributions to the literary journals, was "The American in Paris."

He was a man of most excellent humor, blending happily the characteristics of Rabelais and Sterne and Lamb. When with his chosen associates, we doubt whether even Coleridge was more entertaining or instructive. Turn to his Parisian letters, and see the union of wit and humor, of playful satire and nice observation, which pervade them. Examine all the pleasant books of travel, of which this age has been so prolific, and answer whether they have been surpassed.

"I know Sanderson," we said a few weeks since to a French Deputy, who was travelling here. "Know John Sanderson! I derived from him my knowledge of Paris." "Je ne sache pas que il y ait eu un Francais qui ait plus connu Paris et son monde." In that home of the gay, the brilliant and the profound, at all that in life or art attracts the man of genius, or learning, or taste, Mr. Sanderson was the favored guest of the most celebrated savans many and wits, of whom since his return to the United States, have waited anxiously for his restoration to their circles. And he himself looked forward with happy anticipations to the renewal of old friendships. In a few months he was to reoccupy his apartments in the Rue de Rivoli. "There," he said to the writer of these recollections but a week ago, "there with congenial spirits I shall spend the residue of my days." How much those friends will sorrow when they learn that John Sanderson is no more!

He was a wit; he had a most delicate perception of the beautiful, and a keen sense of the ludicrous; and those who knew him can tell with what care he directed his powers. He never summoned a shadow to any face, or permitted a weight to lie on any heart. He was as amiable as he was brilliant. He was a man of the world. He knew society, its selfishness and want of honor, but he looked upon it less in anger than in sadness. He was no cynic, no Heraclitus; he deemed it wisest to laugh at the follies of mankind. Through all his experience, he lost none of his natural urbanity, his freshness of feeling, his earnestness and sincerity.

The late Theodore Hook, the first humorist and most celebrated bon vivant of our day, was employed by his publisher to edit Mr. Sanderson's "American in Paris." He read it, adapted it as well as he could to the English market, and returned it with the observation that "there was never a book which offered more from slightest change." Had the author devoted the chief portion of his time to letters, he would have been little less distinguished in the same department than his famous friend. But he lived a quieter and happier life he died a happier death; suddenly, but in a home, and with his friends about him. R. W. G.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE.

Our last week's notice brought the proceedings of the National Institute down to Tuesday. On Wednesday morning Prof. J. G. Morris, of Baltimore, read an interesting paper on the past and present state of Entomology in the United States. Prof. R. S. McCulloch, late of Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, followed next, in some brief extemporaneous remarks on the very interesting subject of planetary perturbations. Mr. William B. Hodgson, of Georgia, then read a paper of great interest on the megatheroidal fossils of the Atlantic coast of Georgia, which he described rapidly but clearly. He also presented to the Institute, accompanied by some interesting remarks, a valuable work entitled Crania Ægyptiaca, from the pen of Samuel George Morton, M. D., of Philadelphia. Some of the conclusions arrived at in this work are that the valley of the Nile was peopled by Caucasian races; that negroes were, in all historic periods, numerous in Egypt, and their condition, relative to the white race, was then that of servants and slaves, that the physical distinctions of race are as old as the earliest records of man.

Dr. Morris next read a paper prepared by Professor E. Foreman, of Baltimore, who could not attend in person, on domestic exchanges in natural history and geology. The session of the morning was closed by Capt. A. Mordecai, of the United States Ordnance Corps, who read a valuable paper explanatory of a ballistic pendulum constructed at the Washington Arsenal for experiments in gunnery.

The exercises of Wednesday evening were commenced by Professor Bache, superintendent of the United States Coast Survey, who, in a very lucid and comprehensive review of "the History of Science in Europe and America," commanded the attention of his audience for more than an hour. He was followed by Professor Jacobs, of Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, who read a paper on "the Indian Summer." To him succeeded Dr. A. D. Chaloner, of Philadelphia, who gave a minute and interesting account of the "Petrified Forest near Cairo, in Egypt, discovered by Monsieur Linant, Chief Engineer and Hydrographer to the Pacha."

On Thursday morning Peter A. Browne, Esq., of Philadelphia, delivered an address on "an improved method of teaching the natural sciences." Professor W. W. Mather, of Ohio, delivered a discourse "on the physical geology of the United States." Professor C. Gill, of Flushing, New York, read an interesting memoir "on the improvement of mathematical science, and the consequent advancement of the natural sciences."

In the evening President Nott, of Union College, N. Y., read a paper on the Origin, Duration, and End of the World. He was followed by Professor J. H. Agnew, of New York, on the Glacier System, or Period of Agassez, a new and somewhat extraordinary theory introduced by M. Agassez.

On Friday a paper was read by Prof. Locke, of Cincinnati, on the Meteorology, &c., of Lake Superior. Prof. N. A. Norton, of Delaware, read a paper on the Nebular Hypothesis. Capt. W. H. Swift delivered a very able paper entitled "A description of the base line of Rhode Island, measured in the year 1843, for the survey of the coast of the United States." He was followed by Dr. Sewall, of Washington, with an essay on the design and utility of the medical department of the National Institute.

On Saturday the exercises of the morning were opened by F. J. Grund, of Philadelphia, who read an eloquent and very interesting paper "on the Modern Historical Schools of France and Germany, and the Philosophy of History." Professor Bache then read a paper by Professor J. W. Bailey, of West Point Academy, "on the Fossil Polythamia of the United States." The reading of this paper was followed by one of W. R. Johnson, of Philadelphia, "on the mind of the character and researches of the late James Smithson." Professor Bache appeared again on the rostrum with a paper from the pen of the Rev. James Curley, of Georgetown College, being a description of a meridian circle for the observatory of that old and celebrated institution. Dr. William H. Van Buren, of the United States Army, then delivered an essay "on the effects of opinion on the human system as a remedial agent." The exercises of this highly interesting meeting were closed by an address from Dr. J. B. W. Dandar, of Baltimore, "on the importance of physiology as a branch of general education."

The Institute closed its session on Monday. Hon. Mr. Spencer making some very appropriate remarks. In the morning, Mr. John Tyler, Jr., read an admirable paper on the Franklinian theory of electricity, which showed a vast deal of application to a very interesting pursuit, and to science in general. In the evening, Professor Patterson, of Philadelphia, and the Hon. Alexander H. Everett, had a very large audience. President Tyler did not come down to close the exercises; but the Hon. John Quincy Adams presided in the morning, and assured the members of the Institute of his hearty co-operation with their noble cause.

TRANSCENDENTALISM.

There is no part of the country where the modern fog school of philosophy, called sometimes "transcendentalism" gets harder hits than in New England; and the Yankee wits have shown, perhaps, more true humor in this matter than in almost any thing else. A German book recently fell into the hands of somebody in Boston, in which book one "Seatsfield" is eulogised enormously, as an American writer. Who is Seatsfield? was asked on all hands, and echo answered, Who? At last somebody more apt than the rest at penetrating grindstones discovered that the German intended the name only as a generic for American writers in the gross, though what it means is more than we can undertake to say. Seatsfield is the personification of American literature. The matter, however, has given a mad wag in the Boston Courier the opportunity to perpetrate one of the pleasantest pieces of fun which we have seen in many a day. Here it is. It is only necessary to say in introduction that the city of Hull contains five legal voters, and by pipelaying may be made to throw ten votes.

Seatsfield being the greatest American author, must of course be the greatest Hull author. He is one of us born and nurtured in our free Hallonian state, and has gained a name and a fame by his own native Hullonian genius; and that name and that fame extend from Skull Hill to Calf Island, and from Skewhegan to Cutty Hunk.

If you will take the trouble to look into the ninth volume of Kallendar's Antiquities of Hull, you will find "all about" the Seatsfields. They are cotemporaries of the ancestors of Christopheles Sly, and "came in with Richard Conqueror." The poet's great grandfather's great uncle had a hand in Eikon Basilike. His father was the author of Junius, and his half brother wrote the Whole Duty of Man. One of his ancestors, moreover, made a voyage to Formosa, with Geoffrey Salmanazar, and divers of his kindred have written the most unheard of works. Is it not a strange caper of fortune that this "greatest American author" with his name so familiar on our lips, is a learned German's pun.

To go into a full analysis of Seatsfield's writings, one must have the unfathomable depth of Apollo's Oracle, and be a learned German himself. I can only say as he does himself, Seatsfield has an "inexhaustible thoroughness," and, what is more, a thorough inexhaustibleness—there is no "using up" the fellow. "None but himself can be his parallel." His "psychological stand-point" is a peg or two higher than what your common poetical fowls roost upon to look into the fog. His muse has all the desperation of poetry and all the poetry of desperation; all the inspirations of profundity, and all the profundity of inspiration. His intellect is all-searching, his imagination all-grasping. In artistical tact his power is super-eminent, and with a master hand he clutches the eel of transcendentalism by the tail. As Kallendar very aptly has remarked, he has a forty horse-mackerel power of thought and fancy. "We see him," says the great German critic, "in all his works, overlooking the form, and engrossed in the subject alone;"—a very clear description, which I shall make still clearer, by saying that, in the great chowder-pan of his poetic creations, it is all one to him whether you get pickerel or flounder, halibut, herring or squid—but "in the name of the prophet fish!"

A few particulars respecting so eminent a personage will doubtless be gratifying to your readers. Seatsfield is a man whose personal appearance would strike the most superficial observer. He is five feet several inches high, and some more; and there is every probability that he is of a larger size now, than he was in his younger years. When erect he commonly stands upon his feet—but when sitting, he is accustomed to alter his position. He is very apt to crook his elbow, which may not be thought much to his credit by some folks, but I must state my solemn conviction, that he means no harm by it, and that it is "only a way he has got." When poetically inclined, he sometimes takes a bite at a red herring, but he thinks his ideas come nearest to the "climax of sublimity," over a pohagin stew. He seldom walks out with an umbrella, unless there is prospect of rain; always follows his nose when he goes abroad, and never was known to pick his teeth with a wooden shoe, in all his lifetime.

The New York American gives a very plausible solution of the enigma. It seems, according to that paper, that an intelligent German travelled in this country a few years since, collecting whatever good literary matter he could lay his hands upon, translated those miscellaneous works into his vernacular, and from time to time gave them all to the German public under the same name; until, from the wonder excited by their variety of character, the name of the author became so popular that anything which purports to be from the pen of "Seatsfield," will now command the readiest sale in Germany.

AN IRON STEAMER.

A steamer was on Saturday last launched at New York, for the U. S. Revenue Service, a description of which we borrow from the Tribune. It was built by Messrs. Dunham & Browning, and is the first iron vessel of any considerable magnitude, except one or two built at Pittsburg in the State, ever built in America. The Legare, for so she was named at the time of her launch, by order of Government, is a most beautiful specimen of naval architecture, and is constructed entirely of iron, the plates being about 7 feet long by 26 inches wide, and three-eighths of an inch thick. She is 150 feet long, 24 feet beam, 11 feet hold, and measures 350 tons. The iron is of the best possible quality, of Pennsylvania manufacture. The entire weight of iron used for the vessel was between 160 and 170 tons. She was built under the immediate superintendence of Mr. Thaddeus Bell, and Mr. Robert Latou does the joinery and cabinet work. The engine will be placed in the vessel immediately by Messrs. Hogg & Delamater, at the Phœnix Foundry. She is built with the Ericsson Propellers, on the same plan as that of Captain Stockton's vessel, the Princeton.

It can should enter as largely into the building of vessels as appearances would indicate that it must, the good old "Key-stone State" will derive that benefit from her inexhaustible mines, to which her industry and enterprise fully entitle her. In the ordinary and necessary course of things, should no unwise legislation mar so fair a prospect, the stocks of Pennsylvania will be sought at such a premium, as will more than compensate for any inconvenience which delay may have caused heretofore.

GOING OFF.

The New Orleans Crescent City, tells a story of a duel near that city in which the pistol of one of the parties did not go off; so instead of waiting to receive his antagonist's fire as per agreement, he went off himself. As he took the pistol with him, that of course, "went off" too.

CASH!

We heard of a gentleman, says the Upper Marlboro' (Md.) Gazette, who not long since died in this county, at an advanced age leaving considerable property, and on examining into his affairs, his entire indebtedness amounted to but fifty cents, and that was contracted within a few days of his death. We suppose no case of the kind has ever before occurred.

"Tis true, 'tis pity, and pity 'tis, 'tis true," that such cases are so rare that our Marlboro' friend is not so remarkable for never having heard of such a thing as this before. Such cases have occurred, however, and will again. So manifest is the advantage of "short reckonings" and so sure the benefit of the "long friendships," which follow, that it does seem as if all the world and his wife must ultimately come into the wisdom of the practice, among the other "improvements of the age."

If this worthy old gentleman only left a will—as every body should do, and thoroughly put his house in order before he died, what a saving will there be of probate and executors charges! His property, much or little will go to his heirs subject to no deductions for unravelling knots, and straightening snarled and tangled accounts; and all who held business or social relations with him while alive, can think of him dead, with respect for his character, and affection for his memory, undimmed by any obtrusion of dollars, dimes, and cents into their reflections upon the dead.

Keeping the house in order is not sufficiently recognised as a duty—if it were, the simple incident upon which we are commenting would not be quoted as a circumstance so remarkable. A man who keeps his accounts square all round, lives so much easier and happier for it that it is a course of life which will repay all the temporary self-denials which it may require. "Out of debt—out of danger" is one of the most sententious proverbs ever handed down, and it is a great pity that its practical observation were not universal.

A dollar cash is better than three of credit. It is better to buyer and to seller. It commands a better bargain for the one, and is a sure profit to the other even (pardon the bull) though he sell at less than cost. A dollar is a dollar, in any state of the weather, and keeps its value, while the commodities which are bought with dollars are subject to all manner of depreciations and changes.

He who buys on credit receives, he who buys for cash confers an obligation, or at any rate the parties meet on equal terms. "The purchase made, and the money paid" there are no afterclaps. A bad bargain paid for, may be forgotten by the loser—but if he have merely contracted to pay for something which disappoints him in the possession, the annoyance is not only greater, but lasts longer. So if you raise sound sleep and good digestion—deal promptly, and have your ledger always legible. In small matters never accept credit—particularly if you be a man of small means—for just the person who should make most of his money is he who has least of it.

NEWS FROM MEXICO.

The latest intelligence from Mexico advises us of the settlement of an armistice between Mexico and Texas, to last until the 1st of May, 1844.

Important despatches had been sent out to France, relative to the difficulty between that country and Mexico. This difficulty grows out of the interference of Mexico with foreigners engaged in the retail trade in the Republic.

It is said, and on what is considered good authority that Santa Ana has pardoned and released the Santa Fe prisoners at Perote.

Gen. Thompson, the American Minister, in taking leave of Bocanegra, the Mexican foreign Secretary, says the relations of peace between the two countries were never on a better footing, and thus concludes: "I beg you to assure his Excellency, the President Santa Ana, of my sincere wish for his prosperity and the future welfare of his country, and to tender him my acknowledgments for the many proofs of his benevolence which I have received. To yourself, my dear sir, permit me sincerely to give assurance of my high respect and eternal friendship."

FROM AFRICA.

By an arrival at Baltimore we learn that the brig Francis Lord, Capt. Brown, of New York, was fired into on the West Coast of Africa, by the British ship of war Alert, on the night of the 24th of January. The ball was fired from a musket. The Francis Lord hove to, and the Englishman sent a boat on board, with a lieutenant. Captain B's firm and gentlemanly inquiry of the reason of such treatment, embarrassed the lieutenant, who offered some explanation, assuring Captain B that

United States SATURDAY POST.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION, &c.

$3 per annum—$2 if paid in advance; $1.25 in advance for one month.

Postmasters are requested to frank their letters addressed to us. The word "free" or "post" is not a frank.

Agents will please endorse their letters with their names or initials.

Other letters will not be taken from the Post Office unless the postage is paid.

Papers discontinued only at the end of the current half year's subscription, and then only at the option of the Publisher if arrearages are due.

Small Bank Notes of current Banks received in payment for our bills.

Agents are earnestly solicited to make quick remittances, without which it is difficult to keep accounts correct. They should always give names and time paid for.

Renewals must always state the Post Office required from, as well as to which the paper is to be addressed.

LIST OF AGENTS.

☞ The following agents will sell us for the Saturday Post, under the new publishing arrangements.

☞ THAVELLING AGENTS for Graham's Magazine, United States Saturday Post, and the Ladies' National Magazine.

☞ We have no travelling agent by the name of Winchester.

Mr. C. W. JAMES, of Harrison street, Cincinnati, Ohio, is our Agent for Ohio, Indiana and Michigan, assisted by Moses Hoofer, Jos. R. Smith, G. H. Cornelius, J. R. Humphreys, J. T. Dent and E. Y. Jennings.

JOHN NIMMO, Canada, East and West.

HENRY M. LEWIS is collecting for us in Alabama and Tennessee.

ISRAEL E. JAMES is Agent for us in the South and South-Western States and Florida, assisted by James K. Whepple, William H. Weld, O. H. P. Stone, and Henry Flint.

THOMAS SEYERS is our Travelling Agent for New York.

WILLIAM A. PIERCE collects for us in Pennsylvania.

JAMES PIERCE is our Travelling Agent in New Jersey.

W. H. and W. M. WHEELER, for Arkansas.

Notices of New Works.

NOTES ON EPISCOPACY. By Thos. Wm. Marshall, Curate of Swallowcliffe, Salisbury. With an Introduction by Rev. J. M. Wainwright, New York. D. Appleton & Co. Philadelphia. G. S. Appleton.—This is a work, supporting high ground; and is written with great talent and controversial skill. It will be read with great interest at the present time by those who have entered into the discussion upon the subject of which it treats. The writer brings a great deal of ecclesiastical lore to bear upon the question, but it must be conceded that he has not quite so much charity and discretion, as he has power of language and logical acuteness. It is a work which will probably command more readers than almost any which has ever appeared upon the subject. Of the merits of the question we express no opinion; and close by informing whoever may desire to read the book that the publishers have put it, as is usual with them, in a most neat and convenient shape.

PICTORIAL UNITED STATES. By John Frost. Philadelphia: E. H. Butler.—This number embraces from the period of the capitulation of the British at Yorktown, to the re-election of General Washington, as President of the United States. The embellishments are of the most beautiful character.

MAGAZINES.—From Zieber we have the Democratic Review for April, an interesting number—equal in all respects to any of its predecessors; and the KNICKERBOCKER, as lively and like itself as ever; and as chasty and agreeable in its editorial department.

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE.—This able and spirited paper has been encouraged by prosperity or compelled by business, or acted upon by both influences, to enlarge its size and remove its types. It is one of the most widely read Whig journals in the United States.

OLIPHANTANA. Philadelphia: Zieber & Co.—The Literary Remains of Willis Gaylord Clark, heretofore noticed and advertised in this paper, have made their appearance in a very neat form. Farther than this we have not space, to day, to speak.

☞ "The Open Bible, the People's Safeguard," is the title of a neat Pamphlet just published by Lippincott & Co. It embraces the substance of four discourses recently delivered to his congregation, by Rev. Jas. F. Berg.

MCCULLOCH No. XI. Philadelphia: Zieber & Co. This number of the valuable Gazetteer of McCulloch, is illustrated with a map. It commences the second volume of the Gazetteer, which will be completed in twenty numbers.

SNAGSPEARE.—The third and fourth numbers of this beautiful work are out, and may be had of Zieber, and at the depot No. 98 Chestnut streets. It improves as the work proceeds.

FUN AND MELODRAMA.—Robinson & Peterson have received, Hood's "Shades and Oddities," with funny illustrations, and Victor Hugo's Hunchback with horror yonder off.

☞ No. 15 of the Mirror Library, is "Sands of Gold" containing selections from Bettie Hazell, Horace Smith, and Washington Irving. Zieber has it.

KOSCIUSCO.—Colon has sent us a "Romance of the Revolution," under this title. Its theme must make it attractive to Americans.

☞ From No. 98 Chestnut street, we have No. XI of McCulloch, and the Mirror Library, No. 15; Oliphantana, &c.

☞ From Colon we have the Magnet, the Rover, the New York Dunstar, and other periodicals.

State Legislature.

IN SENATE, Wednesday, April 3. The Individual Liability Bill of Mr. Penniman, was taken up and passed. A bill supplementary to the Ridge Road Turnpike Bill, passed final reading. It authorizes the company to collect tolls from carriages attending funerals. The bill relating to Imprisonment for Debt was taken up and discussed. This bill dispenses with especial bail, making it in all cases absolute, and also provides that the non-imprisonment law shall not affect debts contracted before its passage.

IN THE HOUSE, the most important business was the action upon a resolution directing that the Legislature shall adjourn on the 10th inst. A motion was made to substitute eighteenth for tenth, and to this an amendment was offered by Mr. Toland, modified by Mr. Rosmfort, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Legislature will not adjourn sine die until the bills providing for the payment of interest on the State debt and the sale of the State works be disposed of."

In this shape it passed—yeas 60, nays 24. Many of the gentlemen who voted in the negative declared that they did so, not because they were opposed to the spirit of the amendment, but because they thought there was time enough before the 18th to do all the public business.

The Bill to sell the Main Line of the Public Improvements for $20,000,000, was taken up and discussed until the hour of adjournment.

IN SENATE, Thursday, April 4th, a vast amount of private and local business was disposed of. A bill graduating the pay of officers on the public works to the amount of their labor, was passed. The bill relative to imprisonment for debt was debated until the hour of adjournment.

IN THE HOUSE, the Bill to sell the Main Line was taken up, and three important amendments were adopted. One of these forbids the Company from becoming carriers of merchandise; another declares the works to be public highways; and the third provides for the raising of a three mill tax. The bill passed Committee of the Whole, was reported to the House, and ordered printed.

The Bill to reduce the capital stock of the Bank of Pennsylvania passed finally. The Bill to compel the Tide Water Canal Company to receive a portion of its own notes (one tenth) passed second reading.

IN SENATE, Friday, April 5. The bill relative to imprisonment for debt was taken up, and that part which relates to debts contracted before the passage of the act of 1842, was stricken out. Other amendments were made, and the bill was then postponed.

IN THE HOUSE. The bill to reduce the capital stock of the Manufacturers' and Mechanics' Bank of the Northern Liberties, passed second and third readings.

The Militia bill was taken up on second reading, and discussed till the hour of adjournment. In the afternoon it was again resumed, and passed second reading, after a lengthy discussion. On the vote to transcribe for third reading, the yeas were, 58; nays, 33.

IN SENATE, Saturday, April 6. The Appropriation bill was taken up and discussed. It was amended by inserting $265,000 instead of $275 000, for the expenses of government, and other amendments were debated.

IN THE HOUSE, the Tide Water Canal Bill, and the Bill to reduce the expenses of the Militia System passed third readings.

The vote on the bill relative to licensing oyster cellars in Philadelphia was reconsidered, and the bill was amended so as to limit the number to fifty, to place the price of license at $100, and to subject them to the law of 1831, regulating inns and taverns.

IN SENATE, Monday, April 8. The Appropriation bill was under discussion.

The Tide Water Canal Bill (House) passed second reading.

IN THE HOUSE, the Bill for the sale of the Main Line, and laying a tax of three mills in the dollar, was discussed the whole of the day. Attempts were made to fix the amount at thirty, twenty-four, eighteen and sixteen millions, but the section was adopted as reported, fixing the price at twenty millions; the bill was progressed in as far as the fourth section, and was then postponed. Several bills were reported, and a bill to authorize the Commissioners of Philadelphia County to issue certificates of loan, for damages sustained by the opening of certain streets, passed final reading.

HARRISBURG, Wednesday, April 10. The Senate were at work on the Appropriation Bill, which was taken out of Committee on Tuesday. The House are busy with the bill to sell the Main Line.

Religious Intelligence.

METHODIST CONFERENCE.

The Philadelphia Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church commenced its sessions on Wednesday of last week, and have been busily occupied with such business as comes in course before it; and with the memorials, &c., from the Quarterly Conference. The annual sermon was preached by Rev. John Kennedy, and will probably be published by authority of the Conference. It was an able and eloquent performance. The pulpits of the several churches in the city were supplied on Sunday by the Rev. Gentleman from a distance, and great interest was manifested by large congregations.

The following is the Delegation chosen to the General Conference, which will be held in New York, in May next: the Reverends, Dr. Durbin, Mr. Thompson, Mr. White, Dr. Cooper, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Wm. Cooper. Rev. Robert Gerry and Rev. David Bailey, were duly chosen reserve delegates.

TAKING THE HABIT.—The United States Catholic Magazine states that at the convent of the Visitation, Georgetown, D. C., in February, the religious habit was given to Miss Julia Pearce, (Sister Mary Eulalia,) Miss Georgianna Pearce, (Sister Mary Michael,) both of Boston; Miss Elizabeth Travers, (Sister Mary Agatha,) of Washington; and Mrs. Keating, (Sister Mary Joseph,) of Philadelphia.

WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY OF OHIO.—Jedediah Allen, of Royalton, Ohio, has given $15,500 for the foundation in the first place of eleven Scholarships for his children, nephews and cousins, and the remainder for the endowment of the "Allen Missionary Professorship."

☞ Some of the members of Mr. Brackenridges Church in Baltimore, have taken a spacious lot on Fells Point, at the intersection of Market and Gough street, and are about to erect a handsome new church.

☞ Rev. Spencer Cone, of the Baptist Church, New York, baptised, on Sunday last, at the head of Cherry street, East River, the first Jew convert to Christianity ever baptised into that communion in this country.

☞ It is announced in the New York papers by Hugh Auchincloss, Treasurer, that the amount received by him for account of the Free Church of Scotland, up to April 1st, 1844, was $26,868 23.

☞ The corner stone of a new Methodist Episcopal Church, to be built on the site of the one destroyed by fire last year, was laid at Wilmington, N. C., on Tuesday week.

☞ The Rev. John Dowling, of Providence, R. I., has accepted the unanimous call of the Berean Church, New York, to become their pastor.

☞ The Right Rev. Dr. Reynolds, Roman Catholic Bishop of Charleston, S. C., has arrived in that city, and taken possession of his See.

General News.

TERRIBLE ACCIDENT.—On the 19th ult., as the wife of Mr. Griffin, of Lebanon, N. H., was at work boiling pitch in order to make rosin, in attempting to remove the kettle, she accidentally overturned it, and the contents immediately took fire and spread to all parts of the floor. Mrs. G.'s clothing took fire—but as she had three children in the room, the youngest but three months old, she disregarded her own sufferings in order to save them. Unable to open the door, she burst through the window, and her screams soon brought her husband to her relief, who found her lying on the snow in intense agony, her clothes completely burnt off, but still with presence of mind enough to tell him how to save the children, in which he partially succeeded, to the peril of his own life. The poor but heroic woman died at nine o'clock in the evening. One of the children, it is feared cannot survive.

MURDER IN PITTSBURG.—A man named Charles Beil, a painter by trade, was taken to the Mayor's office, with his throat partially cut. His wife and two children were found murdered in his house, and, as it appears, by his own hands. The deed appears to have been perpetrated with an axe. He attempted also to murder a third child which escaped with a partial but severe injury, after which he had attempted to cut his own throat with a razor. Beil is a dissipated drunken wretch, and assigns no other reason for these horrible acts than a conceit of jealousy. The third child it is said will recover of its wound, and Beil's own wound is said not to be dangerous.

SMALL ROGUERY.—A Rochester paper states that a man named Joseph Thomas, was committed to await his trial for stealing in quite a novel way. He usually carried with him a small tin cup. Upon entering a store where clover seed was sold, he would sit down near the vessel containing the seed, and while pretending to examine it, would fill his pockets with his cup. The pockets were provided with a hole, so that the seed would run into a large space between the shirt and lining. In this way he would accumulate quite a quantity, and then sell it.

KENTUCKY HEMP AND COTTON.—The Louisville correspondent of the New York Tribune writes "that the most important product of Kentucky soil is hemp." The value of this crop, he states, "rises two and a quarter millions of dollars, of which $1,900,000 in value, is manufactured into cotton bagging, bale rope and cordage, and the residue shipped in its raw state to the Atlantic ports. Of the cotton bagging, about 80,000 pieces, and of the bale rope, about as many coils, valued at $1,520,000 is shipped from this port."

FIFTEEN HOUSES BURNT.—We learn from the Boston papers that on Saturday night, between 9 and 10 o'clock, a fire broke out in the extensive stable attached to the tavern owned and occupied by Messrs. Henry Sprague & Son, situated on the main road, Cambridgeport. The stable, with several adjoining sheds, &c., and part of the tavern, were consumed, together with two wagons laden with goods. The stable contained between thirty and forty horses, and fifteen of the animals perished in the flames.

A HARD CASE.—An exhibitor in Mexico must perform what he advertises in the bills, or the authorities come down upon him with a fine. Vieuxtemps had a concert advertised, but the orchestra absconded for some unknown reason, and two overtures promised in the programme, were omitted. The audience were well pleased with the substitution of extra fiddling by Vieuxtemps, but the authorities the next morning imposed a fine of $50, which the violinist was obliged to hand over.

CONNECTICUT.—R. S. Baldwin, Whig candidate for Governor, received 29,556 votes; Chauncey F. Cleaveland, Democrat, 28,398; Liberty candidate and others, 1,902. Baldwin lacks 750 votes of an election by the people. Of 178 Representatives elected, 98 are Whigs and 80 Democrats. A second trial was made to elect thirteen members. Towns entitled to thirty members, have adjourned without delay, and cannot elect. The Senate stands 15 Whigs to 6 Democrats.

THE WHEAT CROP.—The Alexandria, D. C., Gazette says:—"We are pleased to learn from the neighboring counties in Virginia and Maryland, that the growing wheat crop presents a very promising appearance. So early in the season nothing, of course, can be predicted of the result—but if the good beginning continues to the end, the farmers will rejoice in an abundant wheat crop."

☞ The number of hogs killed in Cincinnati, during the last winter, was 196,123. The whole number of hogs packed there during the same time was, in round numbers, 240,000—10,000 less than were packed there the previous winter.

CONVERGE OF BRITAIN.—The number of foreign arrivals at this port from January 1st, to March 31st, 1844, was 222. The number of foreign arrivals from January 1st, to March 31st, 1843, was 128. Increase of foreign arrivals, 94. The revenue from January 1st, to March 31st, 1844, is estimated at $1,310,000. The revenue for the corresponding time of last year was $589,740,12. Increase of revenue, $720,059 88.

AMERICAN PORCELAIN.—Two gentlemen from England are about establishing themselves at St. Louis, where they purpose manufacturing on an extensive scale, queens and porcelain ware. Earth, for the common earthen ware, and for the vessels in which the queensware is burned, abounds in the vicinity of St. Louis. Porcelain clay, equal to that used in England, is found in several counties in the State of Missouri.

THE SMITHS.—A writer in the Norfolk Beacon, tells of a town in Texas, which he visited, where, out of a population of four hundred, the Smiths numbered three hundred. The postmaster, the collector, the broker, the colonel of the militia, the acting magistrate, the candidate for Congress, the cashier of the bank, the principal merchant, all bore the uncommon name of John Smith!

POST OFFICE CORRESPONDENCE.—It was stated by Mr. Merrick in the Senate last week, that the number of paying letters which passed through the mail last year, were twenty-four millions. Of this number seventeen millions passed over distances less than 250 miles. It is impossible to estimate the number of letters which passed outside the mail.

LUCKY HIT.—An old building about to be pulled down in the Bowery, N. Y., was sold to two Irishmen, on condition they would remove it. They went to work at it, and in tearing open some of the wainscoting, found a jug, which, on examination, proved to be a money jug, containing, it is said, $9,000 in gold coin. This is a good prize.

UNIVERSITY OF PENNA.

The Annual Commencement of the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania took place on Thursday of last week in the great saloon of the Musical Fund Hall. The music was under the direction Mr. B. C. Cross, and as usual on such occasions it was of a character excellent enough to seem more than a secondary attraction to the very brilliant audience which crowded the great saloon.

After an appropriate prayer offered by Rev Dr. Ludlow, the Provost of the University, the Degree of Dr. of Medicine was conferred upon one hundred and fifty-three graduates. From the list annexed it will be perceived that this time honored Institution is not merely a Medical College, but one among many of the bonds of union which perpetuates the Republic. Not a section of our common country is unrepresented among the candidates; and these young men as they separate will carry away the practical feeling that they have dear friends and countrymen in the parts of the Union most distant from their own residences and spheres of action. The leading seminaries of our country exert a quiet but most powerful influence in this respect, which entitles them to all encouragement on the highest national grounds; and particularly are those worthy of support and favor which unite to these considerations so many intrinsic advantages as the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania.

After the ceremony of conferring the degrees was concluded, Dr. Horner delivered a valedictory to the graduates, the character of which is thus summed in the United States Gazette: It was vigorously written, enforcing the truths which are the result of a lengthened experience; pointing with brevity and perspicuity to the duties which it behooves every medical practitioner carefully to fulfil; and picturing forth, in their true colors, the high rewards that wait upon the well directed exertions of the physician. Dr. Horner's address commended itself to the attention, and through the attention, to the best feelings of the heart. The path of duty was made clear, and earnest exhortations given to induce that close and abiding attention to the study of the profession, which will always secure success and eminence. The responsibilities of the Christian as well as the man, were impressively commented upon, and the means whereby the usefulness of the profession might be enlarged and dignified, brought home to the understanding.

The following is the list of the graduates:

Alison, Kemp P., North Carolina, Laryngitis Membranacea.
Anderson, Edward, Alabama, Atmospheric Air.
Anderson, Mills T., Mississippi, Counter Irritation.
Archer, Junius L., Virginia, Puerperal Fever.
Arrington, Alfred W., N. Carolina.
Badin, Almon Z., Pennsylvania, Intermittent Fever.
Bare, Adam S., Pennsylvania, Disease of the Ovaries.
Baur, Peter, Virginia, Hydrocele.
Bayne, John T., Virginia, Croup.
Bayne, John Roy, Virginia, Intermittent Fever.
Beardsley, William C., N. Y., Erysipelas with black tongue.
Blackburn, John W., New Jersey, Scarlatina.
Bleight, Benjamin, Pennsylvania, Malpractice Fever.
Bliss, William W., Massachusetts, Delirium Tremens.
Boye, Martin H. Jr., Structure of the Nervous System.
Bryan, James W., Virginia, Scrofula.
Buckles, Edwin Gray, Virginia, Acute Meningitis.
Button, John M., Virginia, Dysentery.
Cardona, John T. M., Delaware, Hepatic Abscess.
Carter, Lewis W., Virginia, Diarrhea.
Channing, Wm. Francis, Mass., Application of Chemistry to the Arts.
Clarke, James L., Va., Phenomena of Catamenia.
Clark, Wm. J., Virginia, Regimen of Dyspeptics.
Clingman, John Y., North Carolina, Scarlet Fever.
Compton, Franklin M., Tennessee, Inflammation.
Cooke, Thomas J., Virginia, Atmospheric Air.
Cosar, Joseph, North Carolina, Inflammation.
Crenshaw, Octavius A., Virginia, Spermatorrhea.
Cullen, Thomas F., Pa., Anchylosis of Knee joint.
Curtis, William, Pennsylvania, Dyspepsia.
Curwen, John, Pennsylvania, Scrofulous Opthalmia.
Custis, Peter, North Carolina, Acute Gastritis.
Dandridge, Robert, Pennsylvania, Acute Dysentery.
Dejarnette, George S., N. C., Mental influence over the Organic Functions.
Dickey, Elcanor V., Pennsylvania, Erysipelas.
Dillard, Richard, Virginia, Strictures of Ureters.
Dilworth, Samuel Jr., Pa., Influence of Mind upon the body.
Dimmitt, Addison, Ky., Physiology of the Circulation.
Dock, George, Pa., The blood as modified by disease.
Eldridge, William T., Virginia, Fractures.
English, Lemuel E., New Jersey, Influenza.
Fairfax, Alexander, North Carolina, Scarlet Fever.
Farquharson, Robert J., Tenn., Phenomena and causes of Inflammation.
Fetterman, Abraham H., Pennsylvania, Pertonitis.
Foley, James T., Virginia, Cynanche Trachealis.
Foster, Perry S., North Carolina, Rheumatismata.
Garnett, John M., Virginia, Chronic Gastritis.
Gaunt, Charles S., Pa., Mercury and its Compounds.
Gleason, Charles W., Vermont, Capillary Circulation.
Gordon, Felix, Pennsylvania, Intermittent Fever.
Graham, Chauncy W., North Carolina, Pertonitis.
Graves, Robert, Virginia, Fracture of the Femur.
Green, Lewis D., Pa., Purpose and Province of Medical Science.
Green, Alfred W., Pennsylvania, Bronchocele.
Greene, John H., Virginia, Tetanus.
Green, Solomon, Virginia, Dyspepsia.
Gregg, Edward F., South Carolina, Death.
Hair, John P., Virginia, Diseases of Menstruation.
Hair, Theodore B., Pennsylvania, Dysentery.
Hall, Edward A., Pennsylvania, Remittent Fever.
Hagner, Andrew P., Pa., Influence of Medicine.
Hardey, Charles A., Louisiana, Congestive Fever.
Harris, James W., Alabama, Metrorrhagia.
Harris, Robert P., Pennsylvania, Tetanus.
Hatch, Thomas E., New Hampshire, Apoplexy.
Hathaway, Edmund V., Rhode Island, Scrofulous Ulceration.
Heaton, Joseph T., Alabama, Functions of the Brain.
Henry, Bernard, Pennsylvania, Aneurism.
Heywood, Benjamin, Massachusetts, Spermatorrhea.
Holliday, Daniel C., La., The Eye, a Diagnostic Sign of Disease.
Hobson, Ephraim Jr., New Jersey, Acute Peritonitis.
Howell, Junius H., Tennessee, Poisoning by Opium.
Hughes, I. Clayton, Alabama, Puerperal Fever.
Hughes, W. Patrick, North Carolina, Puerperal Peritonitis.
Hopkins, James W., Virginia, Cerebrum Section.
Irwin, David D., Mississippi, Yellow Fever.
Jobs, Eugene, New Jersey, Diabetes.
Joyner, Henry, North Carolina, Intermittent Fever.
Joyner, William Henry, Florida, Acute Peritonitis.
Keating, William I., Pennsylvania, Typhoid Fever.
Knott, James E., Tennessee, Protochloride of Mercury.
Lane, William S., Pennsylvania, Whooping Cough.
Leidy, Joseph, Pennsylvania, Comparative Anatomy of the Eye of Vertebrate Animals.
Long, William L., North Carolina, Remedial and poisoning influence of Lead.
Lumly, Etheldred W., Virginia, Cynanche Trachealis.
Mackie, William H., Kentucky, Poisoned Wounds.
Marshall, Alexander K., Kentucky, Superfetation.
Marshall, David B., Pennsylvania, Vitiligo.
Mason, Randolph J., Virginia, Scarlatina.
Maupin, George W. G., Virginia, Scarlatina.
Mayer, Edward R., Pennsylvania, Nitrate of Silver.
Meem, A. Russell, Virginia, Calomel, use of in Febrile affections.
Medlicott, George H., Va., Importance of the knowledge of Physiology and Diseases in the treatment of disease.
Moss, Edgar, Virginia, Amaurosis.
Moody, James I., Alabama, Congestive Fever.
M'Clellan, John H. P., Pennsylvania, Medullary Fungus.
M'Elheny, William S., Pennsylvania, Dew.
M'Intosh, William S., Mississippi, Chronic Hepatitis.
M'Leod, Murdoch, North Carolina, Acute Pleuritis.
Osborne, Richard A., Maryland, Medical treatment of Strangulated Hernia.
Palmer, William Cox, Maryland, Menstruation.
Parrish, Joseph, New Jersey, Scrofulous Diathesis.
Penn, John A., Ohio, Rubeola Vulgaris.
Phillips, William R., New Jersey, Electricity.
Phinney, Joel R., New York, Cutaneous diseases.
Phinney, Leander R., New York, Ulcer of the Cornea.
Priestly, Joseph, Pennsylvania, Wounds of Arteries.
Reid, James A., Virginia, Belladonna.
Reid, James R. M., Virginia, Remittent Fever.
Roberts, John H. Jr., Georgia, Acute Gastritis.
Rogers, Julius, Delaware, Acute Hepatitis.
Roper, Lewis, Pennsylvania, Delivery of Placenta.
Rucker, Angus A., Virginia, Iodine.
Saull, Samuel, Pennsylvania, Dyspepsia.
Scales, Rawley A., North Carolina, Puerperal Fever.
Scott, Samuel D., Penn., Physiology of the Eye ball.
Seaver, Benjamin S., South Carolina, Cicrrhosis.
Seabrook, John G., South Carolina, Neuralgia.
Sharp, James H., Tennessee, Lencorrhea.
Shaw, Elias P., North Carolina, Intermittent Fever.
Sherrons, Washington, Pa., Feigning of Disease.
Sims, Francis, Pennsylvania, Rheumatism.
Sullivan, Edward L., Tennessee, Vagrolla.
Smith, Granville, Virginia, Amaurosis.
Snowden, John W., Pennsylvania Diagnostic sign of Pregnancy.
Still, Moreton, Pennsylvania, Pathology of Cyanosis.
Stone, Henry Osgood, Massachusetts, Polypus of Nose.
Summerell, Joseph J., N. Carolina, Influence of Opium in Autumnal Fevers.
Sykes, John B., Alabama, Heat as a mobile agent.
Thisborro, James T., Va., De Febre Biliosa Remittente.
Taylor, John B., Virginia, Intestinal Worms.
Taylor, Moses B., N. C., The Pulse and its modifications.
Terrell, George F., Va., Menispermum Canadense.
Tiffin, Edward P., Ohio, Uterine Hemorrhage.
Tyler, William Jr., Maryland, Scarlatina.
Weaver, William W., Kentucky, Tobacco.
Weston, Clement H., Ohio, Primary Syphilis.
White, Elias A., North Carolina, Gastritis.
Wickham, Lewis, Va., Inflammation of the Kidneys.
Willcoxon, Tard S., Pennsylvania, Fractures.
Willis, Edwin Alonzo, Ohio, Moral Medicine.
Williams, Henry F., N. Carolina, Menstruation.
Wilson, Benjamin, Virginia, Bilious Remittent Fever.
Wilson, Daniel, Pennsylvania, Pleuritis.
Wilson, William, Pa., Tartar Emetic, use of in Obstetrical practice.
Wilson, William M., Virginia, Scarlatina.
Wilson, Thomas H., Pennsylvania, Dysentery.
Wood, Thomas, Pennsylvania, Inversion of the Womb.
Woodward, J. Lewis, Virginia, Hernia.
Wylie, William, Tuste Carolina, Epidemic.

The Degrees of Doctor of Medicine was also conferred upon the following named gentlemen, at the commencement in July, 1843:

Bagley, Anderson, Virginia, Fractures of Thigh.
Boon, Jesse, N. Carolina, Fracture.
Michie, Theodore A., Virginia, Acute Rheumatism.

Notices of the Dead.

FRANK JOHNSON.—This well known colored musician, and celebrated performer on the Kent bugle, died at his residence in Sixth street, near Lombard, on Friday night, of bronchitis. He had been sick for some time. Frank's reputation was not confined to this city alone. He visited Europe with his band about ten years since, and gave a series of concerts at the Argyle Rooms, London, which met with distinguished success. He was a regular visitor with his band at Saratoga, Ballston Spa, and other fashionable watering places. He had also made the tour of the United States, and performed successfully in most of the principal cities.

His funeral took place on Tuesday afternoon. He was buried at St. Thomas' African Church, south Fifth street. An immense concourse of people followed him to the grave, including the colored Masonic Lodge, of which he was a member, and the Demosthenean and Philomathean (colored) Societies. His band performed over his grave, the dirge composed by the deceased, and played by them, on the retirement of Washington at Mount Vernon.

DEATH OF MORGAN LEWIS.—The New York papers record the death, in that city on Saturday last, of the venerable and distinguished patriot of the Revolution, Major General Morgan Lewis, President General of the Society of the Cincinnati of the United States. He fought gallantly in the army of the Revolution which he entered in 1775, and was particularly distinguished on several occasions. In 1804, he was elected Governor of New York State; and in 1812 he was chosen Judge of the Court of Errors, and was called first to the chair of the Senate, which he has filled various offices of high trust and dignity, and always with great credit to himself, and usefulness to the State. In 1812, he entered the army, and performed valuable services to the country, and was finally appointed Major General. He was, at the time of his death, Grand Master of the Masonic Order, of New York.

☞ Micajah Pendleton died recently in Nelson county, Va., aged nearly eighty-six. He is believed to have been the foremost leader in the present great Temperance Reformation in Virginia, if not in the Union. Before the year 1840, it is known that he signed a Temperance Pledge, and carried it about, soliciting and obtaining signatures. His own pledge he kept faithfully till his death, extending it to wine and cider, which he considered as alcoholic drinks, differing from whiskey only in strength.

A PATRIOT.—Died, at his residence in Montgomery county, Pa., on the 20th ult., Joseph Wheless, aged eighty-three years. He was a native of Halifax county, North Carolina; and removed to this State and settled where he died, about forty years since. He was a veteran of the American Revolution, and was in many hard fought battles in North Carolina and Virginia. He entered the army at its commencement while aged only sixteen, and remained in the service till the close of the war.

DEATH OF JAMES HOWARD.—James Howard, the "invalid vocalist," as for the last ten years he has been styled, died at his residence in this city, on Saturday last, aged 49 years. He had been laboring for some ten years under a severe affliction of the spine, which had completely crippled him.

☞ Died, February 11th, at the residence of his son, in North Woodbury township, Bedford county, Pa., Kifer, a Revolutionary soldier of 1774, who had attained the age of one hundred and ten years and six months.

☞ The Ohio State Journal, of the 4th inst., records the death of the Hon. H. A. Moore, member of Congress from that district, at his residence in Columbus.

☞ John Stuttlebean, a soldier of the Revolution, died recently, near Kaskaskia, Illinois, aged one hundred and nine years.

Miscellaneous News.

☞ The election in Rhode Island, last week, resulted in the election of Gov. Fenner, without organized opposition. The Providence Journal says the Legislature will stand 21 Whigs and 7 Democrats—in the House 56 Whigs and 11 Democrats, making a majority of sixty on joint ballot, against the friends of universal suffrage.

TALL FISHING.—The Norfolk Beacon of Tuesday, says:—"One thousand eight hundred and ninety-five shad were caught at one haul at one of the Fisheries on Thursday last, and at another, on Wednesday, fifteen hundred shad and thirty thousand herring were taken at one haul."

☞ A man engaged upon the roof of a house building in Hoboken, N. J., was precipitated to the earth a fearful distance, by the falling of the scaffold upon which he stood, last week. He was, strange to say, entirely uninjured save and except a slight bleeding at the nose.

CANCELLATION OF RELIEF NOTES.—Eighty thousand dollars of the 4th of May issues of 1841, were cancelled by the State Treasurer, in the months of February and March, and that amount has been handed over to the Auditor General for destruction by burning.

AXE MANUFACTORY.—There is an axe manufactory at Collinsville, about fifteen miles from Hartford, Ct., which turns out eight hundred a day, yet cannot fill all its orders. There are one hundred and forty-five men employed in it. The axes sell for $13 a dozen.

MAINE ELECTION.—We learn from the Bangor Democrat that, on the fourth trial, the Hon Shepherd Cary, Democrat, was elected to Congress in the Seventh Congressional District. The same paper states that there was no choice in the Fifth District.

☞ The freight cars on the New York and Erie Railroad ran off the track on Saturday night, a few miles above Piermont, killing the conductor of the train, and destroying the tender and one or two cattle cars.

☞ The steamboat New Philadelphia, one of the line between Philadelphia and New York, bears a Fox on one paddle box, and a Coon on the other, while a wooden Rooster perches on the pilot house.

☞ The Second Congregational Church of the Rev. Mr. Bond, at Norwich, Ct., was entirely consumed by fire on Friday night week, with the valuable organ.

☞ The Temperance Societies of Cincinnati and its neighborhood had a grand celebration of the anniversary of the first Temperance Society on the 5th inst.

☞ The citizens of Cincinnati have, by a direct popular vote, authorised their city councils to loan $100,000 to complete the Little Miami Railroad.

☞ Militia "Trainings" have been abolished in Maine, by act of Legislature.

THE THIRTEENTH DISTRICT.—Mr. Pollock, the Whig candidate is elected to Congress from the Thirteenth District, in this State, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Frick.

☞ Upwards of $30,000 of the New Orleans Third Municipality notes were destroyed by the Finance Committee, in that city, on the 20th ult.

☞ The election in Virginia takes place on the 29th of April—a fortnight hence. Both parties are extremely active in the canvass.

☞ The carriage shop of Collins & Co., at Middlebury, Ohio, was destroyed by fire, a few days since. Loss $2,500.

☞ The New York papers say that 5,000 persons have been naturalized in that city during the past two weeks.

☞ The expense to Baltimore County for the trial and execution of Adam Horn, amounts to $2,200.

Army & Navy.

☞ The United States brig Consort, Lieut. Commanding H. Y. Purviance, twenty-three days from the Cape de Verds, arrived at Norfolk on Saturday. Left at Port Praya March 6th, the United States frigate Macedonian, bearing the broad pennant of Commodore M. C. Perry. She was getting under way when the Consort sailed, bound to the Windward Islands. The United States sloop Saratoga, Commander Tatnall, sailed from Port Praya a few days before, bound down to the coast of Africa, as far as the Bight of Benin. The U. States sloop Decatur, Commander Abbott, and the brig Porpoise, Lieutenant Commanding Craven, were cruising on the coast to the leeward, the former expected back about the last of March.

APPOINTMENTS.—Commodore William Compton Bolton has, we learn, been appointed by the Secretary of the Navy to the command, as Port Captain, of all the forces afloat at the Norfolk station, which command was recently made vacant by the death of Commore Kennedy. In consequence of this appointment, Commodore Bolton has requested the withdrawal of his nomination, made to the Senate, by the President, as Chief of the Bureau of Construction, Equipment, and Repairs. This selection is deservedly complimentary to this distinguished and gallant officer.

EXPENSES OF EACH NAVY YARD.—A statement recently made to Congress, shows the expense of each navy yard in the Union, from the year 1825 to 1843, inclusive. The aggregate expense of the navy yard at Portsmouth, for that number of years, was $447,422; Boston, $922,169; New York, $945,576; Philadelphia, $602,590, or annual average of $31,712; Washington, $640,300; Norfolk, $965,224; Pensacola, $507,926. The aggregate expenses of all the navy yards for that time was $5,049,060.

☞ The U. S. sloop of war Boston arrived at Rio Janeiro on the 14th of February, in 87 days from Boston. The U. S. brig Perry sailed from Rio on the 10th for the East Indies. The Columbus and Congress were in port on the 17th.

☞ The U. S. sloop of war Plymouth, commander Henry, sailed from Boston on Thursday week, for the Mediterranean stations.

Congressional.

IN SENATE, Wednesday, April 3d. A great number of memorials were presented against a change in the Tariff; against the annexation of Texas; and on other subjects, and several bills were advanced a stage, and much private business was disposed of.

IN THE HOUSE, Mr. Adams from the select committee on the Massachusetts resolutions relative to slave representation, made a report. It will be remembered that each of the gentlemen composing the committee made a report for himself. [On the day subsequent, April 4th, all these reports, five in number were ordered printed.] The resolutions presented by the majority of the committee, that it is inexpedient for Congress to propose any alteration in the constitution in this respect, was adopted—156 to 12.

The bill to direct the President of the United States to put the mineral lands in Illinois, Iowa and Wisconsin in the market, was lost on the question of its engrossment, but a re-consideration was moved.

IN SENATE, Thursday, April 4th. The West Point Academy Bill passed as it had passed the House. The Fortification Bill passed with amendments, and was sent back to the House. The bill for making a navy yard or depot near Memphis, on the Mississippi, was debated, but informally passed over.

IN THE HOUSE, the Army Retrenchment Bill was taken out of committee and finally passed. The consideration of the Resolution from the Senate fixing on the 27th of May as the day of adjournment, was postponed to May 13th.

IN SENATE, Tuesday, April 5th. Mr. Evans, of Me., offered a resolution, which under the rule lies over for one day, calling upon the President of the United States to communicate, if not incompatible with the public interest, all correspondence between the British Government and the United States, upon the subject of the annexation of Texas. [The information called for is probably a despatch of Lord Aberdeen, laid before the President at the time Sir Richard Packenham presented his credentials of office. This despatch will prove officially to the American people that England contemplates no political alliance with Texas, and none whatever but one of trade and commerce.]

Mr. Bayard presented a memorial from Richard A. Gillet, Civil Engineer of Pennsylvania, respecting a new plan for a Dry Dock, which at the same time that it will be permanent will supersede the expense of piles.

The Cumberland Road bill was then taken up, and the remainder of the session given to its consideration.

IN THE HOUSE ten thousand copies of Mr. J. R. Ingersoll's minority report on the tariff were ordered printed. The bill making appropriations for the improvement of harbors and rivers was debated until the hour of adjournment.

WASHINGTON, Saturday April 6. The Senate did not sit.

IN THE HOUSE, the river and harbor appropriation bill was debated all day in committee, over a hundred amendments being disposed of, by adoption or rejection. At a late hour the committee rose and reported the bill, and the House adjourned.

WASHINGTON, Monday April 8. Nothing was done in either house but the passage of the usual resolutions of respect for the memory of a deceased member of Congress, Neman Allen Moore, of Ohio. In announcing his decease, his colleague, Mr. Weller, said that Mr. Moore, had sent at the commencement of the present session of Congress apparently in good health. He was pursued by the hand of death, soon after he came here,

Selected Poetry.

THE SHADOW.

BY HORACE E. GREELY.

I sit at my task, with the sun's blessed light
For my richest of gifts, from morn till night,
And I hear the sound of the trampling feet,
That are ringing along on the stony street;
And many a shadow of passers-by
Comes dimming the light to my careful eye,
Like a flitting mist on the casement thrown,
One moment it falls, and the next is gone,
As, hence by a tide that will not stay,
The present goeth his destined way;
And I never look out on the thronging train
To watch if their footsteps return again,
But every morn through the open door,
One lingering shadow hath marked the floor,
Too silent and slow for the busy throng,
As it bore some weary weight along,
And I raise my eyes each day to see
When a pausch between the sun and me
'Tis a worn old man, and his locks of grey,
Untrimmed and long, on his shoulders lay;
With a painted hand, and a faltering tread,
He totteredh on, and his weary head
Is bowed half way to his mother earth,
And they say there hath been none since his hour of birth
A century told—and his lot is still
A place 'mid the noon of men to fill.
The tender leaves of the coverlip green,
May be through his willow basket seen;
Or the early roses from the garden pulled—
Or the harvest ripe which his hand hath culled;
And he beareth them on from door to door,
Morning his bread—a scanty store.
Were the Summer's sun shines warm and free,
Weary and faint, I wave, is he;
But longer hath spent his staggering feet,
And he struggles on in the sultry heat;
Picking his careful way along,
And shrinking aside from the jostling throng,
And peering through misty eyes in vain
For a firmer spot for his trembling cane
Few are the objects that meet his sight,
For never again will he stand upright—
Few are the pleasures that o'er him roll,
For he chimes no kin with a living soul—
There's no one to lighten his waning life,
He hath no daughter, nor son, nor wife;
And his sire, and his brothers—long since they fell
In that grey field where he fought so well.
'Tis this worn old man, as he totters past,
Who casts the shadow on my floor to cast;
And only when he went by my door
Have I paused to sigh that I, too, was poor;
And still, (let wherever I cannot tell,)
As my eye on this time-bowed veteran fell,
A passive thought to my mind hath sprung,
Of the days when he, like myself, was young;
And his eye was clear, and his lip, and brow,
Lighter and freer than mine are now.
And his foot trod firmly and proudly then
'Mid the honour ranks of the boldest men;
And again I've thought that I yet might be
Weary and worn, and bowed as he.
'Twas then that I learned to love so well
The shadow that over my threshold fell,
And often I turned with a listening ear,
The sound of his coming steps to hear,
Or to wipe a tear from a moistened eye
As that aged man went slowly by.
So passed the Spring and the Summer away,
And I grieved him still each sunny day,
But I missed him at length one dewy morn,
When the sun looked over the golden corn,
And I wended in vain through the live-long day,
But no tottering footsteps came that way;
And my spirit was sadder at eventide,
As if some blessing had been denied.
Again and again the day passed by,
And no lingering shadow had disturbed my eye;
But at length I was roused by a sudden sound,
And a heavy trend o'er the stony ground,
And I turned from my window an anxious eye,
And saw where a domicile bearer was by,
And I knew from that coffin, manshaped and wide,
That that aged man at length had died
My eye sunk back as the train went past,
And the tears on my paper fell thick and fast,
Till the half-drawn sketch my hand had traced,
I knew not why I should weep for him,
Whose sun of life had so long been dim—
Unless it was that he that so other year
Of sorrow would fall o'er his silent bier
And yet it was not for him I wept,
For sorrow, I knew, was the sleep he slept;
He had but sought that home at last,
Where the friends of his youth had long since passed;
But my bosom was swelling with feelings strange—
A thought of Time, and a thought of Change—
A thought of Death's all blighting power—
A thought of Sorrow—a thought of Death—
And a thought beside of that peaceful home
Where the cares of earth have no power to come—
'Twas a mingled tide that o'er me swept,
When I knew of the sleep that old man slept,
And the tears would fall from my brimming eye,
And I wept—I wept—I knew not why.—Tribune.

Selected Articles.

A DOSE.

BY THOMAS HOOD.

"Ellen, you have been out."

"Well, I know I have."

"To the King's head."

"No, John, no. But no matter. You'll be troubled no more with my drinking."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean what I say, John," replied the wife, looking very serious, and speaking very solemnly and deliberately, with a strong emphasis on every word. "You—will—be—troubled—no—more—with—my—drinking—I HAVE TOOK IT AT LAST!!"

"I knew it!" exclaimed the wretched husband, desperately tossing his arms aloft, as when all is lost. "I knew it!!—and leaving one cask in the hands of his wife, who vainly attempted to detain him, he rushed from the room—sprang down the stairs, both flights, by two and three stairs at a time—ran along the passages, and without his hat, or gloves, or stick, dashed out at the street door, sweeping from the step two ragged little girls, a quartern loaf, a basin of treacle, and a baby. But he never stopped to ask if the children were hurt, or even to see if the infant dripped with gore—on—on—on—he ran, like a rabid dog, straight forward, down the borough, heedless alike of a porter's load, baker's basket, and butcher's tray.

"I say," muttered the errand boy, as he staggered from the collision.

"Do that again," growled the placard man, as he recovered the pole and board which had been knocked from his shoulder.

"Mind where you're goin'," bawled a hawker, as he picked up his scattered wares; while a dandy, suddenly thrust into the kennel, launched after the runner one of those verbal missiles which are said to return, like the boomerang, to those who launch it.

But on, on, on, scampered the Teetotaller, heedless of all impediments—on he scoured, like a he Camilla, to the shop, number 240, with the red, blue and green bottles in the window—the chemist's and druggist's—into which he darted, and up to the little ball-mark at the desk, with barely breath enough left to gasp out "My Wife!!" "Poison!!" "Pump!!"

"Vegetable or mineral?" inquired the Surgeon Apothecary, with professional coolness.

"Both—all sorts—laudanum—arsenic—oxalic—acid—corrosive sublimity—" and the Teetotaller was about to add pine-apple rum, amongst the poisons, when the Doctor stopped him.

"Is she sick?"

"No." But remembering the symptoms over-night, the Teetotaller ventured to say, on second thought, his dream, that she was turning all manner of colors, like a rainbow, and swelling as big as a house.

"Then there is not a moment to lose," said the Esculapius, and accordingly clapping on his hat, and arming himself with the necessary apparatus—a sort of elephantine syringe with a very long trunk—he set off at a trot, guided by the Teetotaller, to unpoison the rash and ill-fated bacchanalian Mrs. Burrage.

"And did he save her?"

"My dear madam, be content to let that issue remain a little, and accumulate interest like a sum in the saving's bank."

Now, when the Teetotaller, with the medical man at his heels, arrived at his own house, Mrs. Burrage was still in her bed-room, which was a great convenience, for before she could account for the intrusion of a stranger, nay, even without knowing how it was done, she found herself seated—more zealously, tenderly or ceremoniously—in the easy chair; and when she attempted to expostulate, she felt herself choking with a tube of something which was certainly neither maccaroni, nor stick liquorice, nor yet pipe-peppermint.

To account for this precipitancy, the exaggerated representations of her husband must be borne in mind; and if his wife did not exhibit all the dying dolphin-like colors that he had described—if she was not quite so blue, green, yellow, or black, as he had painted her, the apothecary made sure she would soon be, and consequently went to work without delay, where delays were so dangerous.

Mrs. Burrage, however, was not a woman to submit quietly to a disagreeable operation, against her own consent; so with a vigorous kick, and a push at the same time, she contrived to rid herself at once of the doctor and his instrument, and imaginarily demanded to know the meaning of the assault upon her.

"It's to save your life—your precious life, Ellen," said the Teetotaller, very solemnly.

"It's to empty the stomach, ma'am," said the doctor.

"Empty a fiddle," retorted Mrs B. who would have added "stick" but the doctor, watching his opportunity, had dexterously popped the tube again into her open mouth—not without a fresh scuffle from the patient.

"For the Lord's sake, Ellen," continued the Teetotaller, confining her hand, "do, do, pray do sit quiet."

"Pob—sob—wobble," said Ellen. "Hub—bub—bub—bubble," attempting to speak with another pipe in her throat besides her windpipe.

"Have the goodness, ma'am, to be composed," implored the doctor.

"I won't," shouted Mrs. Burrage, having again released herself from the instrument by a desperate struggle. "What am I to be pumped out for?"

"Oh, Ellen, Ellen," said the Teetotaller, "you know what you have taken."

"Corrosive salts and narcotics," put in the doctor.

"Arsenic and corrosive sublimity," said the Teetotaller.

"Oxalic acid and tincture of opium," added the doctor.

"Fly, water and laurel water," said Mr. Burrage.

"Vitriol, prussic acid, and aquafortis," continued the druggist.

"I've took no such thing," said the refractory patient.

"Oh, Ellen, you know what you said."

"Well, what?"

"Why, that your drinking should never trouble me any more."

"And no more it shall!" screamed the wilful woman, falling, as she spoke, into convulsive paroxysms of the wildest laughter. "No more it shall, for I've took—"

"What, ma'am, pray what?"

"In the name of Heaven, what?"

"Why, then—I've took the PLEDGE!!"

PUNCH'S REVIEW OF BOOKS.

MR. ROEBUCK'S SPEECHES AT THE BAR, BEFORE AND SINCE HIS ELEVATION TO THE RANK OF QUEEN'S COUNSEL.

The Bar of England has long been distinguished for its eloquence, and the custom of publishing a collection of speeches is a common one with popular advocates. Mr. Roebuck's elevation to a silk gown has caused considerable curiosity to be felt as to what he has done in his profession, and has led to the publication of his speeches at the Bar in a pamphlet of sixteen pages, two of which are occupied by the title, two more by the fly-leaf, four by an introduction, six by a preface, and the speeches themselves occupy the remainder of the space which is devoted to them. It is not for us to criticise a specimen of rationication mingled with law—in which the froth of research is seasoned with the pepper of eloquence. We therefore give one of the speeches entire—the collection consists of one than two—in order that the reader may himself judge of the merit of the production.

The speech we are about to quote was made in the presence of the writer of this notice, who never can forget the impression which it created on a mind then fresh in all the buoyancy of hope, and redolent with that respect for genius, which time, alas! moves down like a scythe among the buttercups. But we are forgetting the speech, which we print, word for word, as it was delivered:

"May it please your lordships—

"In a case of Dox on the demise of Rox against Smith, I am instructed to move for a rule, which I think your lordships, when you have heard all that I have to say, will not refuse to me.

[Denman, C. J.—"That depends upon circumstances, Mr. Roebuck."]

My lord, we are all of us, I know, the creatures of circumstances; and as the poet—

[Williams, J.—"Pray, sir, don't tell us any thing about the poet, unless he is a party to the rule."]

Your lordship is right. You have brought me back from those realms, where fancy, like the Lybian bird—

[Patteson, J.—"We can't notice the Lybian bird, unless he has been served with a copy of the pleadings. Pray, sir, let us know what you are going to move for."]

My lords, I wish for nothing but a rule to compute: and in asking for that rule—

[Denman, C. J.—"You have it, sir; and, indeed, you might have banded that motion in."]

Indeed, my lord! Then I shall know what to do another time."

Such was the peroration of the speech of Mr. Roebuck: and as he gave out the words, "I shall know what to do another time," he looked like a lion whose mane had been ignobly pulled, and who was smarting under it. The "other time" has not yet come; but when it does, we have no doubt Mr. Roebuck will be amply prepared for it.

EXTRAORDINARY DISCOVERY OF AN ATROCIOUS MURDERER.

A gentleman who had been robbed by his servant, forgave him, on condition that he would abandon his bad habits; this promise he so far kept, and kept himself so steadily, as to accumulate sufficient money to enable him to marry, and to keep an inn, on a much frequented road. About twenty years after, the gentleman, travelling that way, came to lodge with his old servant whom he did not recollect until the man came forward, made himself known, and expressed how gratified and happy he was in again washing upon him. He gave him the handsomest room and the best fare, but the night had no sooner set in, than this perfidious wretch, after so much show of attachment, stabbed his old master with a dagger, threw his body into a cart, and carried it to a river at the back of the house. In order to avoid discovery, and to prevent the corpse from rising to the surface of the water, he pierced the body through with a long stake, sharpened at the end, which he pushed in the bottom, so that only a small portion of the end of the stake was visible. A few days afterwards some tavens arrived from all directions, and crowded to the spot. Their increasing croaking, attracted unusual attention, and led the multitude to fancy a thousand foolish stories. The pertinacity of the birds was such also, that it was useless to attempt driving them away. This increased the excited curiosity so much, that the stake was at length, with difficulty, drawn out, which was no sooner done, than the body rose to the surface of the water. Inquiries were accordingly made to discover the murderer, and the wheel marks of the cart having been traced as far back of the inn, the master was taken up on suspicion, and confessed his crime.—Faculties of Birds.

GAMBLERS.

A man who had gone over a great part of the world, returned at length home from his travels; his friends came and requested him to relate what he had seen. "Listen," said he, "I eleven hundred tribes found the country of the Hurons, there are men whom I thought very strange; they frequently set a table until late in the night; they do not wet their mouths; lightnings might flash around them, two armies might be engaged in battle, even the roof of a night threaten to crush them in its fall, they would remain unmoved on their seats, for they are deaf and dumb. Yet now and then there escapes from their lips a half broken, unconnected and unmeaning sound; and they horribly roll their eyes at the same time. I often stood looking at them with astonishment, for when such sittings take place, people frequently go to witness them. Believe me, brethren, I shall never forget the horrible contortions which I there saw. Despair, fury, malicious joy, and anguish, were by turns visible in their countenances. Tis sir rage, I assure you, appeared to me that of the furies—their gravity that of the judges of hell—and their anguish that of malefactors." "But what was their object?" asked his friends. "They attend perhaps to the welfare of the community?" "Oh no!" "They are assuring the philosopher's stone?" "You are mistaken." "They wish to discover the quadrature of the circle?" "No." "They do penance for old sins?" "Nothing of all this." "Then they are mad: if they neither hear, nor speak, nor feel, nor see, what can they be doing?" "They are gambling!"—Lichsehr.

The Humorist.

☞ "What will you take for dinner?" asked a waiter at one of our hotels, of a chap who had recently arrived, at the same time handing him a bill of fare. "I don't know," replied the stranger, running his eye down the bill, and soon lost amid fricandeaus, cotelettes, ragouts, French "cake shows," and matters of which he had not the most remote idea—"As it's hard choosin' here, I believe I'll take the lot!"

☞ In the play of "Love and Reason," old Gen. Gordon is persuading Adjutant Vincent to marry. "She is an angel," says the general. "I don't want an angel—I should not know what to do with an angel!" replies the single-hearted adjutant. "She is all sweetness," repeats the general. "So is a lump of sugar," answers Vincent, "but it does not follow that I should thrust my head into it."

☞ Theodore Hook had a dispute in a ballroom with Gen. ——, and Hook kicked the general. "What do you mean by that?" said the general, "am I to take that as a personal affront?" "To be sure you are," replied Hook. "I am glad of it," returned the general. "I like to speak intelligibly—it saves the trouble of further 'explanation.'" Hook heard no more of the officer.

☞ "What is your opinion of the metaphysics of the German doctors?" said a pedantic fellow, anxious to show off, addressing a countryman who made few pretensions to literary talent. "I hardly know what to think of them," was the unmeaning reply. "I've tried sails, rhubarb, and some of the physics of our own doctors, and of them I've a mighty mean opinion."

☞ "Put it out a little further," said a doctor, who was examining the tongue of a female patient; she complied. "A little further still, if you please"—she obeyed again. "Put it out as far as possible, madam." "Mercy, doctor," says she, "you must think there is no end to a woman's tongue."

☞ "Why is our marriage like the British flag?" said an English tar to his bride, on their wedding day. "Because it's a union, Jack," was the quick response.

☞ Zimmerman, so distinguished both as a physician and author, was ordered to attend Frederick the Great in his last sickness. "I presume," said the king to him, "you have helped many a man into another world?" "Not so many," promptly replied the physician, "as your majesty, not with so much honor to myself."

☞ Some philosopher says—"If rich, it is easy enough to conceal our wealth; but if poor, it is not quite so easy to conceal our poverty. We shall find it less difficult to hide one thousand guineas, than a hole in our coat." That's a fact.

☞ "My dear brethren, let me tell you that I am now just half through with my sermon, but as I perceive your impatience, I will my that the remaining half is not more than a quarter as long as you have heard!"

☞ A man by the name of Bliss, lately stole a horse in Ohio, and absconded or hid himself. He can't be found.

"Restless mortal toil for wealth,
Bliss in vain on earth is sought."

☞ A student of medicine from Boston, while attending the lectures in London, observed that "the King's Evil had been but little known in the United States since the Revolution."

☞ A contemporary, intending to make the heading of some articles, wrote "Shreds and Patches." On examination of the proof he found it printed "Shad and Peaches."

☞ It may be useful to some timid railway travellers to state, that the furious puffing of the engine shows the safety valve is open, and explosion impossible.

☞ "Why, it is reported that you found some money," says one individual yesterday to another. "The report is without found-ation," was the reply.

☞ A Cincinnati paper states that there is in that city a young bachelor, who is so modest that he will not even embrace an opportunity to do good.

☞ By what process could a tea table be turned into food?

Ans: Take away the T, and it would be eatable.

Choice Selections.

IT WON'T DO.

It is curious how many thousand things there are, which it won't do to do upon this cozy planet of ours, whereon we eat, sleep and get our dinners. For instance.

It won't do to plunge in a law suit, relying wholly on the justice of your cause, and not equipped before-hand with a brimming purse.

It won't do to tweak a man's nose, or tell him he lies, unless you are perfectly satisfied he has not spunk enough to resent it by blowing your brains out, or, (if you have not brains) cracking your skull.

It won't do, when riding in a stage coach, to talk of another man when you have not added as being an "all-fired scoundrel," until you are absolutely sure he is not sitting before you.

It won't do when snow drifts are piled up mountain high, and sleighs are eternally upsetting, as this winter, to ride out with a beautiful, lively fascinating girl, and not expect to get smashed with her.

It won't do for a man, when a horse kicks him, to kick back at the horse.

It won't do to crack jokes on old maids in the presence of unmarried ladies who have passed the age of forty.

It won't do to imagine that a legislature fed at the public crib, will sit but six weeks, when two-thirds of the members have not the capacity to earn a decent living at home.

It won't do for a man to bump his head against a stone post, unless he conscientiously believes his head is the hardest.

It won't do for a chap to imagine a girl is indifferent to him because she studiously avoids him in company.

It won't do, when in a hurry, to eat soup with a two-pronged fork, or to try to catch flies with a fish net.

It won't do for a man to fancy a lady is in love with him because she treats him civilly and politely on all occasions.

It won't do for a politician to imagine himself elected to office while the "back counties remain to be heard from."

It won't do to take every man to be that you would like to do even if so to do would be to do a favor. It won't do. And now we are done.

A HYMN OF THE SEA.

BY WM. C. BRYANT.

The sea is mighty, but mightier sways
His restless billows. Thou, who stretch'd thy hand
And hemmest in the ocean, hast set bounds
Thou moved in the beginning o'er his face,
Moving as o'er a stream. The obedient waves,
To an strong motion roll and rise and fall.
Still from that realm of rain thy cloud goes up,
As in the first day, to water the great earth,
And keep her valleys green. A kindred realm
With them is bound shadow warping on the wind.
And on the dripping shower, with glorious bear
Thy promise of the harvest. I looked forth
Over the boundless blue, where, joyously
The lively circle of the dolphins wheel
Glance to the sun at once, as when the hands
Of a great multitude are uplaced flung,
At a coronation. I beheld the ships
Gliding from cape to cape, from isle to isle,
Or stemming toward far inside, or hastening home
From the dark world. Thou, who hast made them strong
That bears them, with the riches of the land,
And treasure of dear lives, till, in the port,
The shouting seamen furl the sail and cast
But who shall hale thy tempest—who shall face
The blast that wakes the fury of the sea?
Oh God! thy justice makes the world turn pale
When on the storm-cloud, riding on the wind,
Bears down the surges, carrying war, to mate
Some city, or invade some thoughtless realm,
Dewends the fierce tornado. The sea shrinks
Are whirled like chaff upon the waves, the sails
Fly, rent like webs, and crushed are the masts
Are snapped asunder, downward from the decks,
Downward are slung, into the fathomless gulf,
Their cruel engines, and their hosts, arrayed
In trappings of the battle-field, are whelmed
By whirlpools, or dashed dead upon the rocks.
Then stand the seamen aloof, with fear and pause
A moment, from the bloody work of war.

These restless surges eat away the shores
Of earth's old continents, the fertile plain
Wastes to shallows, the inhabitants are driven
And the tide drifts the sea-sand in the streets
Of the drowned city. Then, meanwhile, afar
In the green chambers of the middle sea,
Where broadest spread the waters and the line
Sinks deepest, while no eye beholds thy work,
Creator! there the tempest is as a voice
To lay his mighty reels. From age to age,
He builds beneath the waters, till, at last
His bulwarks overtop the brine, and climb
The long wave rolling from the southern pole
To break upon Japan. Then half the floor,
That wanders every ocean, bears on high
The new-made mountains, and uplift their peaks
A place of refuge for the storm-driven bird.
The birds and wading fishes place the isle
With herb and tree, sweet fountains gush, sweet airs
Ripple the living lake, that, fraught with flowers
Are gathered in the hollows. Then first look
On thy creation and pronounce it good.
Its valleys, clothed with their summer green,
Praise thee in silent beauty, and its woods,
Swept by the murmuring winds of ocean, join
The murmuring shores in a perpetual hymn.

ANECDOTE OF A DOG.

One day an uncle who came to the house brought a large dog with him and stayed to dinner. Gerald dined at the same table, and the dog stood behind his chair seeming to watch where his best chance lay. He was one of the most beautiful specimens of the greyhound tribe, being of a brown color, with the lofty stature, slender head and limbs, flowing outline, and piercing vision, which give to that species its full perfection. On this occasion he took a dishonorable advantage of these personal qualities, for when Gerald lifted his arm a bit for from his side, he popped his head through the opening, and the plate was cleared. A second supply met with the same fate, and this was repeated two or three times in succession, the dog coming in undiscovered every time the parlor door was opened. At length the quantity the little fellow was consuming seemed to attract my mother's attention. Having supplied him once again, she cast her eyes a few minutes afterwards toward the sale-table, and the state of affaire there set the whole table in a roar. Gerald had this time watched his interests much more closely, and when his aggressor thrust his head again through the narrow defile, he closed his arm and kept it fast locked. When my mother looked over she saw him very contentedly prosecuting his dinner with the huge animal's head under his arm, his left hand being, however, a little limited in its motions by the necessity of keeping his prisoner close. The dog did not struggle, nor attempt to get away; the agreeable prospect before him probably compensating for his temporary loss of liberty; but he seemed to follow with his eyes the point of the fork in the very important semicircles it was describing between his keeper's plate and his lips.—Gerald Griffin.

REMEMBRANCE.—It is a remarkable fact, as has been remarked by some philosophical observer, that every animal, when dressed in human apparel, resembles mankind very strikingly in features. For instance.

Put a frock, bonnet and spectacles on a pig, and it looks like an old woman of eighty. A bull dressed in an overcoat would resemble a lawyer. Tie a few ribbons round a cat, put a fan in its paw, and a boarding school miss is represented. A cockerel in uniform is a general to the life. The features of a tiger call to mind those of a sailor. A hedgehog looks like a miser. Dress a monkey in a frock coat, cut off his tail, trim his whiskers, and you have a Broadway dandy. Donkeys resemble a good many people.

THE OREGON QUESTION SETTLED.

The following speech made by some Western Ajax, settles the question about Oregon at once.

"What, I say, what is the individual who would give up the first foot, the first outside shadow of a foot, of the great Oregon? There isn't no such individual. Talk about treaty occupations to a country over which the great American eagle has flown! I scorn treaty occupation; d—n treaty occupation. Who wants a parcel of low flung "outside barbarians" to go in cahoot with us, and share alike a piece of land that always was and always will be ours? Nobody. Some people talk as though they were affeered of England. Who's affeered. Haven't we licked her twice, and can't we lick her again? Lick her! you just as easy as a bear can slip down a fresh peeled maplin. Some skeery folks talk about the navy of England; but who cares for the navy? Others say she is the mistress of the ocean. Suppose she is—ain't we the mistress of it? Can't we cut a canal from the Mississippi to the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky, turn all the water into it, and dry up the ocean in three weeks? What, then would be the navy? It would be up—shot! There never shall have peace any Atlantic ocean if it hadn't been for the Mississippi, nor never will be after we've turned the waters of that big drink into the Mammoth Cave! When that's done, you'll see all their steam ships and their men of war, they splunge so much about, lying high and dry, flounderin' like so many turtles left ashore at low tide. That's the way we'll fix 'em. Who's affeered!!!"

TO MY MOTHER.

My Mother! on thy fading brow is many a mark of care,
The tale of Life's eventful scenes is deeply written there;
And day by day, as onward I pass through life's rough way,
That Time hath for my Manhood claimed the years of Age from thee.

And now when in maturer years, the scenes of Youth I trace,
And mark the saddened smile that oft will steal across thy face,
The memory of my wayward way is darkly round me thrown,
To whisper that by acts of mine that smile hath sadder grown!

Oh! cold, indeed, would be my heart, did it refuse to thrill,
When I recall thy love for me, that lives unchanging still!
That e'er my spirit over threw, when I had sought its powers,
A spell as sweet as thoughts of Heaven, in melancholy hours

How oft when others (children proved, and I've gone forth to feel,
Amid the world's discordant throng, a lonesome o'er me steal
Hath sweet remembrance given me for those pure friends of mine,
The hearts that as their love grew false, it only deepened thine!

In all the bliss which I have felt—in all the woes of Care,
Thy heart, responsive to my own, would joys and sorrows share;
And when my love to others turned, and cold to thee had grown,
My wandering heart seemed to make thine live for me alone

Then, Mother; be it mine to give a purer love to thee—
A love so holy and so strong as there has been for me;
Driving the world's cold chill away, and cheering your days,
And solace with my better years the lonesome of thine Age!

A. D. F. R.

DEGRADING HABIT OF SWEARING.

It is not easy to perceive what honor or credit is connected with swearing! Does any man receive a promotion because he is a notable blusterer? Or does any man advance to dignity, because he is expert in profane swearing! No. It must be the character which such impertinence will not degrade. Inexcusable, therefore, must be the practice which has neither reason nor passion to support it. The drunkard has his cups, the leecher his mistress, the miser his money, the ambitious man his preferments, the miser his gold; but the common swearer has nothing; he is a fool at large, sells his soul for nought, and drudges the service of the devil gratis. Swearing is void of sense, void of sin, void of temptation, void of soul, nor interwoven with the texture of the body, nor in any way allied to our frame. For, as a great man (Tillotson) expresses it, "though some men pour out oaths as though they were natural, yet oaths are not born of a sweaty constitution." But it is a custom, a low and paltry custom, picked up by low and paltry spirits, who have no sense of honor, no regard for decency; but are forced to substitute some thing—or nonsense to supply the vacancy of good sense. Hence the silliness of the practice can only be equalled by the silliness of those who have adopted it.—Rev. Dr. Lamont.

CHRISTIANITY.

Christianity, like a child, goes wandering over the world. Fearless in its innocence, it is not abashed before princes, nor confounded by the wisdom of synods. Before it the bloodstained warrior sheathes his sword, and plucks the laurel from his brow; the midnight murderer turns from his purpose, and like the heart-smitten disciples goes out and weeps bitterly. It brings liberty to the captive, joy to the murderer, freedom to the slave, repentance and forgiveness to the prodigal, balm to the fainting heart, and assurance to the dying. It enters the hut of the poor man, and sits down with them and their children; it makes them contented in the midst of privations, and leaves behind an enduring blessing. It goes through great cities amid all their pomp and splendor, their imaginable pride, and their unutterable misery, a purifying, ennobling, correcting, and redeeming angel. It is like the beautiful companion of childhood, and the comfortable associate of age. It ennobles the noble; gives wisdom to the wise; and new grace to be lovely. The patriot, the priest, the poet, and the eloquent man, all derive their sublime power from its influence.—Mary Howitt.

WONDERS OF AUSTRALIA.

In this remote part of the earth, Nature, (having made horses, oxen, ducks, geese, owls, elens, and all regular useful productions for the rest of the world,) seems determined to have a bit of play, and to amuse herself as she pleases. Accordingly, she makes cherries with the stone on the outside; and a monstrous animal, as tall as a grenadier, with the head of a rabbit, a bag as big as a bed-post, hopping along at the rate of five hops to a mile, with three or four young kangaroos looking out of its false uterus, to see what is passing. Then comes a quadruped as big as a large cat, with the eyes, color and skin of a mole, and the bill and web feet of a duck, puzzling Dr Shaw, and rendering the latter half of his life miserable, from his utter inability to determine whether it was a bird or beast. Add to this, a parrot with the legs of a sea-gull; a skate with the head of a shark; and a bird of such monstrous dimensions that a side bone of it will dine three real carnivorous Englishmen, together with many other productions that agitated Sir Joseph (Banks,) and filled him with emotions of distress and delight.—Sydney Smith.

A JOKE NO JOKE.—A New York paper states that on Monday last, about nine o'clock in the evening, a man knocked at the door of the house 11 Walker street, occupied by Dr. Andrews, but there being only two young ladies in at the time, one of them went to the door, and saw a man with something nicely wrapped up in a basket, who stated that he had got a child to leave there. The young lady remembering that it was April fools' day, treated the matter as a joke, and thought perhaps it was only a few kittens, and therefore laughed heartily, told the man that it wouldn't do, that the child did not belong there, and moreover that they would not receive it; he insisted that it did, and dropping the basket at the lady's feet, ran off. It was taken into the parlar, and after a good deal of debate between the young ladies, the covering was removed, and a sweet, unconscious infant, about two months old, was found packed very carefully, and labelled "this side up with care." The consternation this discovery occasioned was extreme, and a neighbor was immediately sent for, and the little responsibility was sent to the almshouse.

ON THE DEATH OF MY CHILD.

A mother's kiss, ob, beauteous clay
A mother's tear receive
Soon shall the perfect form decay,
Soon all resemblance melt away,
Of him for whom I grieve.

Upon that alabaster cheek
(As fair, as firm, as cold)
In vain do I those complex mock,
Those charms which to a mother speak
In language manifold!

Upon that little ivy hand
Receive another kiss!
Angel! * * * * sheers I joined the white cold hand,
Which round the throat immortal shall,
In never ceasing bliss.—Metropolitan.

EXTRAORDINARY ATTACHMENT OF BIRDS.—A few days ago, a lad, who was employed by a farmer at Peckham to shoot birds in his corn field, shot a wood-pigeon. On reaching the spot where the bird fell, he was surprised at finding another, hovering close to the wounded one he took up the dead bird, and carried it in his hand some distance, closely attended by the other bird, sometimes following him and sometimes going before, and (to use the lad's own expression,) "making quite a fuss about him." On reaching the field-gate, the lad stopped to reload his gun, placing the dead bird on the gate post, when the other pigeon flew to the side of his lifeless companion, and, without the slightest attempt to escape, quietly suffered itself to be secured by the boy. The bird was brought home, and put into a small room, where shortly after it was found dead. It is now stuffed, and in the possession of the writer.—Standard.

A CHINESE MUSICIAN.

But I may mention one musician, who, for simplicity of apparatus, could not be surpassed. He ate his rice, with a modicum of meat, fish, &c., when he could get them, out of a blue and white saucer, by the help of two chop-sticks, which were two pieces of wood, squared and colored. Then, as the reader knows, are but a wooden knife and fork in their original simplicity; and on this occasion served the purpose of a musical instrument or dining utensils at pleasure. He held the saucer in his left hand and placing the stick between the ring and middle finger, was enabled to move and strike it upon the bottom of the vessel as the rhythm required. With the right hand he held the other stick, and rolled it upon the edge of the saucer, or beat it with a springing stroke, in a fantastic and playful manner. This formed the accompaniment to a song with a quavering and plaintive air, which seemed to afford the auditors great pleasure, who listened with that help from association which the poor foreigner lacked, and which, after all, is one of the main ingredients of all our pleasurable feelings.

THE BROTHER AND SISTER.—Mrs. Child relates the following pleasant anecdote, in one of her New York letters to the Boston Courier:—"I found the Battery unoccupied, save by children, whom the weather made as merry as birds. Every thing seemed moving to the vernal tune of "Original hosts are fresh and fair,

Spring is their season of sport and air."

To one who was chasing her hoop, I said, smiling, "You are a nice little girl." She stopped, looked up in my face so rosy and happy, and laying her hand on her brother's shoulder, exclaimed enthusiastically, "And he is a nice little boy, too!!" It was a simple, child-like act, but it brought a warm gush into my heart. Blessings on all unselfishness! On all that leads us in love to prefer one another. Here lies the secret of our Pilgrim fathers' lives. All else paass which would bring us all into tune. Only by losing ourselves can we find ourselves."

TRUTH TRIUMPHANT.—Whatever may be urged by sophists and politicians, it is certain that the great eternal laws of truth and justice cannot be violated with impunity. The violation may answer some sordid and temporary purpose; but in the end, it must be injurious, if not fatal. The truth, like the sun in the heavens, is one. The clouds indeed are variegated; but then they are insubstantial, and of momentary existence. So is falsehood. It can assume any color, but time overtakes the hues to fade; and truth bursts forth with new effulgence. We see despotism gradually withdrawing from the finest countries in Europe. It must depart, at last, from all, for it is opposed by reason and truth. The truth, which alone can render it permanent, labor in vain; but at the same time, they may detain it a while, and cause in the interval, misery and carnage.—Knox.

FOOD AND PASTURE FOR COWS.—In the same animal, says Johnson this latter quality of his mind is known to be greatly influenced by the kind of food. This is best understood in the neighborhood of large towns, where the profit of the diary-man is dependent upon the quantity, rather than upon the quality of his milk. Hence the value of highly succulent foods—of the grass of irrigated meadows—of mashed and steamed food—of brewer's grains—of turnips, potatoes, and beets—and of other similar productions, which contain much much water, intimately mixed with nutritive matter, and thus tend both to aid in the production of milk, and to increase its quantity.

The Olio.

LACONIC CORRESPONDENCE.—At the time that Gibraltar was closely besieged by the combined French and Spanish forces, both by sea and land, the garrison was often straitened for provisions, on account of the closeness of the blockade, and they were sometimes obliged to draw supplies from Barbary, where the garrison had an agent of the name of Brown. General Boyd, who was Commissary General, wrote to the agent for an immediate supply, and, wishing to avoid the danger of letting the enemy know the distress, should his messenger fall into their hands, he couched his application in the following laconic, but expressive words:

Brown.
Beef.
Boyd.

The agent was successful in sending a supply to the garrison, and with it the following answer:—

Boyd,
Beef.
Brown.

IS A WOMAN'S HEART LARGER THAN A MAN'S?—Jonas being in company a few evenings since where was exhibited a card on which was nicely drawn two hearts, united by a dart from Cupid's bow, and one heart being much larger than the other. The question arose, "Is a male's or female's heart the largest?" It was decided on "Bible authority," that the female heart must be the largest—inasmuch as it is declared that out of the fullness of the heart the mouth speaketh, and it is a settled fact that out of the female mouth comes the most words, and oftener than from the male. Oh, what a Jonas!

LORD BOLINGBROKE, observing the incapacity and ignorance of most of the leading men in his time, says on the subject: "When young, I at first considered those who governed the world, to be men of intelligence; but experience soon undeceived me. I examined those in every place, and found that the great were like those gods of Phrygia, on whose shoulders were fixed the head of a bull, as a mark of supreme power; and that, in general, men were governed by the greatest blockheads among them."

A JOCULAR TRUTH.—A highwayman, named Bolland, confined in Newgate, sent to know how he could defer his trial, and was answered, "by getting an apothecary to make affidavit of his illness. This was accordingly done, in the following manner: "The apothecary believes that if the said James Bolland is obliged to take his trial at the ensuing session, he will be in imminent danger of his life." To which, the learned judge on the bench, answered, "that he verily believed so too."

LOOKING-GLASSES FOR POTATOES.—In Queen Victoria's aviary, at Windsor, the dove-cotes lined with looking-glasses, and the pigeons stand for hours at the glass panels, bowing and cooing in the reciprocating compliments of their own images, and seem to be vastly pleased with the extreme polish of their admirers. Doubtless the female pigeons partake of this enjoyment most frequently, as is quite natural.

FUNNY DESCRIPTION.—In describing the destruction of a brig, a contemporary says: "The only passengers were T. B. Nathan, who owned three thousand dollars worth of the cargo and the captain's wife.

An exchange thinks that something akin to the above, is a case mentioned by a London editor, who speaks of a hen belonging to a man that lays bricks.

SOME ONE, Butler, we believe, has compared a knave to a tooth-drawer, who manages to keep his own teeth in business by extracting those of his fellows. He is an excellent founder, and will melt down a leaden fool, and cast him into what form he pleases. He grows rich by the ruin of his neighbors, like grass in the streets in a great sickness."

LIFE TO LAWYER.—How is a draft usually settled? If it proceeds from a broken window, by an old coat or newspaper.

What is an attachment with a proclamation? When you pop the question to your intended, and ask the mamma's consent.

How do you serve a clerk in court? If he is impudent, kick him.

WHEN YOU wish to sleep in church, quietly take off your superfluous garments, and lay right straight down in the aisle—that is, do it openly; for a church is no place for hypocrisy.

SOME EDITOR has recently propounded the following question:—"If a wheel runs easier for being tired, would the same effect follow the same cause in the case of a horse?"

NEVER EAT while you speak, as a man's throat is too narrow a channel for words to pass up, and good meat to pass down, at the same time.

A MAN WITH small talents well used will get on better than a man with great talents who is too dilatory to use them. Remember that, little 'uns.

☞ Napoleon once said to some boys in a school he visited—"My lads, every hour of lost time is a chance for future misfortune."

☞ "This is a cool proceeding!" as the turkey said when they were shooting at him, on a Christmas day.

☞ Why is a benevolent man like a cart horse? Because he stops at the sound of woe.

☞ Why is a love-sick lady's eye olden like a tattered coat? Because it's full of tears.

☞ When may we expect water to be expensive? When we see rain dear.

☞ "This must be looked into," as the young lady said to the mirror.

☞ When does Turkey oppress China? About Thanksgiving time.

MAKE GOOD USE of your time if you love